

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 1.

EARLDOM OF MAR—RESOLUTION—

Moved to resolve, "That, in accordance with the Resolution agreed to by this House on the 14th June last 'That it is incumbent upon this House to rescind their Order of 26th February 1875, which ran as follows, viz.: 'That at the future meetings of the Peers of Scotland assembled under any Royal Proclamation for the election of a Peer or Peers to represent the Peerage of Scotland in Parliament, the Lord Clerk Register, or the Clerks of Session officiating thereat in his name, do call the title of Earl of Mar according to its place on the Roll of Peers of Scotland called at such election, and do receive and count the vote of the Earl of Mar claiming to vote in right of the said earldom, and do permit him to take part in the proceedings of such election,' the said Order be rescinded, and that intimation to that effect be made to the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland,'"—(The Earl of Galloway) 1215

Amendment moved,

To leave out all the words after "That" for the purpose of inserting the following words: "further consideration has led this House to consider that it would be inexpedient to rescind the Order of the 26th February 1875, which was made after the House had resolved and adjudged that Walter Henry Earl of Kellie Viscount Fenton Baron Erskine and Baron Dirleton in the Peerage of Scotland had made out his claim to the earldom of Mar in the Peerage of Scotland created in 1565, as consequential to such resolution and judgment, and that to rescind an Order so made in relation to a right to a Peerage adjudged after long investigation, and which Order has been acted upon at several elections of Scotch Peers, without any further inquiry and unsupported by any new evidence, would be contrary to the practice of this House and establish an objectionable and dangerous precedent,"—(The Earl of Redesdale.)

After debate, on Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion?" their Lordships divided; Contents 52, Not-Contents 80; Majority 28.

Resolved in the Negative.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

VOL. CCLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

EARL NELSON wished to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, before the House went into Committee, what the position of those trusts would be in which graveyards had been specially granted to the Church of England on condition that the Church of England Burial Service only be performed therein, and where the graveyards were in the hands of trustees for the purpose of carrying out the donor's intention? He (Earl Nelson) knew of such a case occurring last year, and would like to hear the noble and learned Lord's opinion upon the matter.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE also wished to remark that they all knew that burial had two sides—one religious, and the other sanitary. The Bill proposed to deal with the religious side. Now, whatever happened with the Bill, whether it was passed in its present form, or with Amendments, or whether it was not passed at all, he thought, after what had taken place, those with country parishes would find themselves in this position. Hitherto there had been practically no difficulty in getting people buried, because the owners of land and the clergy had been very kind and liberal in giving land for the enlargement of churchyards. But he thought he did not at all misrepresent the case when he said that, for evil or for good, they would not meet with that kind of liberality in future, and he wished to ask what they were practically to do with regard to getting people buried in country parishes? There were many places where churchyards should be shut up, and if the Home Office did shut them up, there would be no possibility of finding a place for the burial of the dead. This opened up a question of great practical importance, and it was obvious that the sanitary side of the problem should have their serious attention. By remedying what was considered the religious difficulty, they might be intensifying a sanitary difficulty, which was of infinitely greater importance.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR confessed that he did not share the anticipations of the rev. Prelate with regard to additional grants of land. He did not believe that any sensible effect would be produced with respect to those gifts. There were few among the landlords of England willing to grant land for burial purposes purely and narrowly denominational, who would not also grant it for purposes of a wider character. With regard to the larger question, as to the possibility of supplying new churchyards and new cemeteries when the old ought to be shut up, his own opinion was that, by passing this Bill, their Lordships would remove a very considerable obstruction out of the way of that operation, because the sanitary question would be no longer mixed up with questions of a quite different character, and there would be no jealousy of any steps which might be taken for real sanitary reasons on account of any controversial matter. He, therefore, thought that not only the existing Acts might be much more readily worked and put into operation, but also that the Government would find it more easy to review those existing Acts than when the religious difficulty stood in the way. He was not authorized to give any pledge on the part of the Government as to the time at which they would undertake to review the existing Acts as to burial grounds; but he might confidently assure their Lordships that Government would not lose sight of that important subject. With regard to the Question of the noble Earl (Earl Nelson), he was glad to say that the noble Earl's views and his were precisely the same. It had been urged by some persons as an objection to the Bill, that it did not throw open to the Church the burial grounds of other religious denominations; but the Bill did not interfere with private burial grounds at all; it dealt only with those in which the parishioners or inhabitants generally had right of burial. He was not aware of there being at the present time any obstacle whatever to the creation of private trusts as to burial grounds for members of the Church of England any more than there was to the creation of such private trusts for the Baptists, or Wesleyans, or any other religious community; and if a trust had been created, as described by his noble Friend, he had no difficulty in stating his opinion that this Bill would in no way affect it.

LORD FORBES expressed regret if he had done wrong in not making his proposal that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, which would have postponed the evil as long as he possibly could. It was a serious thing to deprive the Church of England of her rights and privileges, and give over her heritage to her enemies. He called their Lordships' attention to the fact that members of the Liberation Society regarded the churchyards as outworks of the Church of England, and did not conceal the certainty that when they had carried those outworks it was their intention to attack the citadel itself. He begged the Government, and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, by the love he bore the Church, in a spirit not of anger but of sorrow, in the interest of the Church of England, to withdraw the Bill. He would admit that the noble Lords who had brought on the measure were actuated by the best spirit; but what they proposed would be most prejudicial to the interests of that Church.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Preamble postponed.

Clause 1 (After passing of Act, notice may be given that burial will take place in churchyard or graveyard without the rites of the Church of England).

On The Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendments made, in page 1, line 7, by omitting ("person"), and substituting the words ("relative, friend, or legal representative"); and in line 9, for ("twenty-four") substituting ("forty-eight"); and after ("writing") adding ("in the form or to the effect of Schedule A annexed to this Act").

On the Motion of The Earl FORTESCUE, Amendment made, in line 9, after ("writing") by inserting ("plainly signed with the name and address of the person giving it").

THE EARL OF MOUNT EDGCUMBE, in rising to move, as an Amendment, the insertion in line 13, after ("or place") of the words—

said, it had been urged that that Bill sought to establish religious equality for all denominations in the matter of interment; but much depended on how that expression was to be interpreted. If it meant that all were to have facilities for the use of their religious services at burials, that was a principle which all should support. But if it meant that all religious sects in this country, and others who did not belong to any religious communion whatever, were to have in future concurrent rights which were never exercised before in the property of the Church of England, that was a principle which must carry them far beyond the churchyards, and that was a claim which, in the interests of justice and constitutional principle, the Legislature was bound to resist. He admitted that the Dissenters had a grievance—although some thought it was a sentimental grievance—which could not be ignored. On the other hand, if that Bill passed, it would entail on the Church of England a grievance which many of the clergy had described as intolerable, while many others would feel it most keenly. The House was, therefore, placed in this difficulty, that it must consider which of these two grievances was the more serious one; and, as far as individuals and as laymen were concerned, he could not come to any other conclusion than that the existing grievance of the Dissenters was the more real grievance of the two. If Churchmen felt that it would be a grievance to them if a service different from that of their own Church should be held in their consecrated ground, although it did not affect their own interment or the interment of their friends, surely their feeling would be a much more painful one if they knew, as Dissenters did, that neither they nor their friends could be interred without a service in which they did not concur, or without a minister whom they did not recognize. He would, therefore, admit that the grievance of the Dissenter was the greater; but he deprecated the provisions of the Bill being enforced in places where a grievance did not exist. He held that they should only be applied in cases of necessity where there was no unconsecrated ground. He thought it was a dangerous principle not to give a man his rights; but it was a more dangerous principle to go beyond these.

("Where there is no unconsecrated burial ground or cemetery in which the parishioners or inhabitants have rights of burial.")—(The Earl of Mount Edgcumbe.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the laity of the Church of England had a very great respect for the clergy, and he could not help thinking that if the clergy themselves viewed this matter with more dispassionate eyes, there would be little objection on the part of the laity. He quite agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe) that the pressure of the grievance was much less severe where there were cemeteries and burial grounds other than the churchyards; but he still thought it would be very unwise to adopt the Amendment, which would tend to interfere with the beneficial operation of the measure as a settlement of the controversy. It would at once draw a line between parish and parish throughout the Kingdom. In one parish a Nonconformist would be able to avail himself of the provisions of the Act. In an adjoining parish a Nonconformist would not be able to do so. If the Amendment were adopted, all the controversies which it was sought to put an end to would continue; and he thought that if it was open to no other objection, that ought to be a sufficient objection to it. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Carlisle) had expressed a fear that the operation of the Bill as it stood might check the application of the provisions of the Burial Acts, for the creation of new public burial grounds, where they were wanted. He did not share that opinion; but the Amendment of the noble Earl would really have that effect, because Dissenters would be likely to object to the creation of new unconsecrated burial grounds, when it would have the effect of excluding them from the liberty in the use of the churchyard given them by this Bill. They would always feel it a grievance, if the Services of the Church were forced upon them when they desired to be buried with their friends.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the truth of the matter was, that this distinction between parish and parish would not be created to a greater extent than at present by the Bill—it already existed. What the Legislature now proposed to do was this. The Legislature had, at the expense of the ratepayers, provided equal burial grounds to meet the wants of both parties, and, while that legislation was to remain in force, it was proposed in this Bill to pass a Proviso to the effect that, besides burying in their own unconsecrated grounds, the Dissenters should use the consecrated grounds of the Church as much as they liked. Unless the Amendment were agreed to, there was great danger that the consecrated grounds would be very speedily filled up. Already a tendency in that way had been displayed, and sufficient time had not elapsed for ancestral associations to gather round the ordinary cemeteries. Even people who did not believe there was much in consecration would have their friends buried in consecrated ground, thinking that, if there did happen to be anything in it, they would do them greater honour by putting them there. This would result in a confiscation of Church property. The present law with regard to the cemeteries answered very well, and it was going too far to attempt to apply to them arguments which were only good as regarded churchyards, which stood on a totally different footing.

EARL NELSON pointed out, as regarded ancestral associations, that the claim of persons to be buried side by side with their ancestors had been set aside before by the Sanitary Acts. In his opinion, a great hardship would be inflicted upon members of the Church of England if the Amendment were not accepted. It would be a great grievance to Churchmen that, while there was abundant room in the unconsecrated portions of the cemeteries, the Dissenters should, by claiming the right of burial in the consecrated portion of the ground, fill it up, as had been pointed out by the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York). He further thought it would be unfair not to accept the Amendment in order to meet the circumstances of certain parishes, such as in the case of Ribchester, near Preston, where the old churchyard was closed 10 years ago; and another piece of ground was given to the church for a burial ground, there being at the time burial grounds for the Independents and the Roman Catholics. In this case it would be a hardship if all parties should, under the operation of the Bill, resort to the Church burial ground; therefore, he should vote for the Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York), would it be wise, by passing the Amendment, to allow an opportunity for ancestral rights to grow up, with their accompanying grievances? They would be perpetuating a small grievance among those whom they should seek to conciliate, by preventing them from being buried by the side of their relatives who might have been interred in consecrated ground. He hoped the Amendment would not be agreed to.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendment made, in page 1, line 16, after ("without the"), by adding ("performance, in the manner prescribed by law, of the"), and omitting ("prescribed by law") after ("service").

LORD STRATHNAIRN moved an Amendment providing that the provisions of the Bill should not apply to the burial of any person who had by word of mouth or writing publicly declared that he did not believe in God. He considered that it would be a very injurious thing to inter an Atheist in the burial ground of a Christian people. He could not agree with the so-called generous sentiment on this important subject.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 20, at the end of clause insert—

("Provided always, that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to the burial of any person who shall have by word of mouth or writing publicly declared that he did not believe in God.")—(The Lord Strathnairn.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that at present such persons were entitled to be buried in the churchyard, and the real effect of the Amendment, taken in connection with other clauses in the Bill, would be the opposite of what was desired by the noble and gallant Lord, for it would be that every such person would have to be buried with the Service of the Church of England.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendment made, in page 1, line 30, after ("and") by adding ("a copy of it;") and, in same line by omitting ("given"), and instead thereof inserting the words ("be delivered or sent by post not less than twenty-four hours before the time appointed for such burial").

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK moved an Amendment, declaring that a graveyard within the meaning of the Act should not apply to any consecrated portion of a burial ground of which some portion had been left unconsecrated, nor to any consecrated burial ground in a place where one or more unconsecrated grounds were also provided under the Act.

Moved, to leave out the last paragraph of the clause, and insert—

("But such power of giving notice of burial shall not apply to any consecrated portion of a burial ground formed under the Acts fifteenth and sixteenth Victoria, chapter eighty-five, and sixteenth and seventeenth Victoria, chapter one hundred and thirty-four, of which some portion has been left unconsecrated; nor to any consecrated burial ground in a place where one or more unconsecrated grounds are also provided under the Act twentieth and twenty-first Victoria, chapter eighty-one, section three.")—(The Lord Archbishop of York.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in opposing the Amendment, said, he hoped their Lordships would not accept it, as by so doing they would only change the area of the grievance which Dissenters had complained of. He had, on the second reading of the Bill, stated at some length his reasons for that opinion; and he would not now repeat them. He could not think it probable that, so long as the fees charged for burials in the consecrated parts of cemeteries were greater than those in the unconsecrated parts, which was at present the case, the use of the consecrated parts by Non-conformists under this Bill would be likely so largely to increase as to make the space left insufficient for Churchmen. The Committee would remember that the provisions of the Bill on this subject were not one-sided. It contained a clause which the most rev. Prelate did not propose to omit, enabling the Burial Service of the Church of England to be performed in an unconsecrated portion of a burial ground by any clergyman of the Church of England who might be willing to officiate at a burial there.

EARL FORTESCUE, in supporting the Amendment, said, that he had voted for the second reading because he was anxious to remove the grievance which was felt to exist; but it could not be alleged that this Amendment would perpetuate a grievance.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause? their Lordships divided:—Contents 108; Not-Contents 127: Majority 19.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that they had been dealing with the old churchyards and other matters, and he now wished to introduce quite another subject for consideration. He would propose, as an Amendment, to move the insertion, at the end of the clause, of these words—

Their Lordships had decided that in the ancient churchyard services should be celebrated which were not the Services of the Church of England. The principle of the Bill was intelligible enough as applied to them, although the title of the Church to these churchyards was undoubtedly strong. It rested upon the possession of centuries. But he wished to direct attention to the churchyards to which her title was also strong, but which she held by the will of the donors who were living, or who lived recently, and whose wishes were perfectly well known. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack (Lord Selborne) had said that this was a question upon which the clergy were on one side and the laity on the other; but he thought there was absolutely no foundation for that statement. Many Members of that House and of the other House of Parliament had been donors of graveyards in recent times. Among such donors he might instance the Duke of Northumberland and the Duke of Rutland. The noble and learned Lord told them that they had no representatives from the laity on the subject of the Bill; but he (the Marquess of Salisbury) had in his hand a protest from donors of land given for either new churchyards or for additions to old churchyards, and the same was given under the existing laws, which it was imagined would continue in force, otherwise they would not have given it; and that showed the strong feeling of the laity against this Bill. To this protest there were some 300 names of Members of both Houses and other donors. His noble and learned Friend said, the other evening, that the new churchyards would remain as they were—that was, dedicated to the purpose of burial for all Her Majesty's subjects; but there were two trusts, and his noble and learned Friend ignored one. No doubt, everyone could be interred who died in the parish. As to that there would be no difference. The churchyard would be used for all classes of Her Majesty's subjects; but as to the other trust—that persons interred in them should be buried with the Service of the Church of England, it was on that trust that this Bill would make a vital alteration. It was a serious grievance, and one which the donors complained of, that if persons had given land for the purpose of having celebrated in it the Services of the Church in whose dogmas they believed, and to which they were attached, the power of Parliament should be called into play for the purpose of wresting it from that purpose, and for the purpose of celebrating in it the service of communities which differed widely from the Church of England. The noble and learned Lord would, no doubt, say that these Services would be Christian, and in no way widely different from those of the Established Church; but the noble and learned Lord had already furnished an answer to that argument, for he had defined a Christian to be anyone calling himself by the name of Christian. It was absurd to maintain that there was no violation of the donors' wishes when there might be celebrated in the churchyards the service of the body which rejected every one of the distinctive doctrines of his own Church. He was glad, however, to believe that his noble and learned Friend's statement was true in a majority of instances. But there was also a widely different spirit abroad—a spirit which might be exemplified by what took place not very long ago in the Paris University. A few months ago, a celebrated writer—a Protestant—was appointed a Professor in Paris. The students of that city were not very fond of dogmas of any kind, and there was a probability that the new Professor would be received with some discontent, because he was suspected of the cardinal vice of Christianity. His defence was—"I am a Christian if you will, but a Christian without dogma and without belief." He (the Marquess of Salisbury) believed that Christians without dogmas and without belief were not so uncommon in this country as some people imagined; it was a fashion which seemed to be increasing. He admitted that the majority of those who would take advantage of this did not differ from them on matters which, in view of the great controversies of the day, they were entitled to characterize as of primary importance; but that did not alter the position, rights, and claims of the donors of churchyards. They had practically opened the door for every kind of belief,

and whether such cases as he had indicated were few or many, the rights of the donors were equally violated. He feared, too, that in time to come the differences which now marked off the Nonconformist Body from the Church of England would not be of the same secondary importance as at present. A study of the religious doctrines of the present day led to the conclusion that the dissidents with whom the Church of England would have to deal in the future would be persons whom no stretch of comprehensiveness or charity could include in the pale of the same belief with it. He therefore thought they were indulging themselves in a vain hope, if they thought that after the lapse of a few years those who now differed from the Church would be satisfied with what was now proposed to be done. Whether the difference between the Church of England and Dissenters was great or small, the rights of donors were equally injured. It was not a question whether he and his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack thought the difference between them a large one. The question was, What did those persons think who granted their property for a specific purpose? They had a right to decide for themselves whether the matters were great or small. They were matters of private judgment, of individual decision, and no one had a right to lay down a rule on the question. It used to be objected to equity, in olden times, that its measure was the length of the Chancellor's foot. But if we were to have the degrees of dogma which separated respective sects decided by the length of the Chancellor's foot, or in accordance with his particular opinions, we should be in a worse state still. The noble and learned Lord was known as an attached friend of the Church of England; but the Chancellor of to-morrow would stretch his charity further than the Chancellor of to-day, and include Unitarians; and a Chancellor after that might stretch a little further, and include those who did not believe in any Divinity at all. The question whether the bequests or gifts of those donors had been dealt with honestly was in no degree affected by the feeling of the present Lord Chancellor as to how far Dissenters might differ from the Church of England. When he (the Marquess of Salisbury) said it was a question of honesty to donors, he rested on the language used by Parliament itself. He would draw the attention of their Lordships to the fact that Parliament, 60 years ago, awoke to the fact that the provision for the spiritual destitution in this land was quite inadequate, and that churches and churchyards required to be extended. Of the churches it was not now necessary to speak. Parliament, while making provision for supplying this need, in some cases by public money, in other cases invited the munificence of private individuals to supply that which was wanted; and, in doing so, Parliament stated the terms on which the assistance could be accepted. In 1823, in one of the earliest Church Building Acts, there was laid down the deed of conveyance by which the ground added by free gift to churchyards was to be conveyed to the Church Building Commissioners, who were the predecessors in title of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of to-day. In this Act were cited various other Acts on the same subject, and they contained these words—

“ And every piece of land, ‘ when conveyed to the said Commissioners, shall become for ever thereafter devoted to ecclesiastical purposes, in order that the same may be consecrated by the Bishop according to the rites of the United Church of England as Ireland ’ as by ‘ law established. ’ ”

It was impossible for Parliament to put a pledge in more distinct and absolute terms than what the words of the Act conveyed. Our Parliamentary practice did not know a more distinct pledge than that, and yet it was now proposed that Parliament should disregard it. If any member of the Episcopal Bench was to invite a man to give his land on a promise that it should be used for the service of the Church of England and Ireland, and were then to use some legal power for the purpose of opening it to all classes of men who called themselves Christians, their Lordships knew by what name to call this. It would be nothing less than defrauding the owner of the land. Why was it less fraud when committed by the Imperial Parliament? Was Parliament the only body which could not make any binding promise? Were they to assume that, however solemn and detailed the promise made, and in however blind a confidence it had been acted on by a donor, yet when, in the changing course of politics, it became

Their Lordships had decided that in the ancient churchyard services should be celebrated which were not the Services of the Church of England. The principle of the Bill was intelligible enough as applied to them, although the title of the Church to these churchyards was undoubtedly strong. It rested upon the possession of centuries. But he wished to direct attention to the churchyards to which her title was also strong, but which she held by the will of the donors who were living, or who lived recently, and whose wishes were perfectly well known. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack (Lord Selborne) had said that this was a question upon which the clergy were on one side and the laity on the other; but he thought there was absolutely no foundation for that statement. Many Members of that House and of the other House of Parliament had been donors of graveyards in recent times. Among such donors he might instance the Duke of Northumberland and the Duke of Rutland. The noble and learned Lord told them that they had no representatives from the laity on the subject of the Bill; but he (the Marquess of Salisbury) had in his hand a protest from donors of land given for either new churchyards or for additions to old churchyards, and the same was given under the existing laws, which it was imagined would continue in force, otherwise they would not have given it; and that showed the strong feeling of the laity against this Bill. To this protest there were some 300 names of Members of both Houses and other donors. His noble and learned Friend said, the other evening, that the new churchyards would remain as they were—that was, dedicated to the purpose of burial for all Her Majesty's subjects; but there were two trusts, and his noble and learned Friend ignored one. No doubt, everyone could be interred who died in the parish. As to that there would be no difference. The churchyard would be used for all classes of Her Majesty's subjects; but as to the other trust—that persons interred in them should be buried with the Service of the Church of England, it was on that trust that this Bill would make a vital alteration. It was a serious grievance, and one which the donors complained of, that if persons had given land for the purpose of having celebrated in it the Services of the Church in whose dogmas they believed, and to which they were attached, the power of Parliament should be called into play for the purpose of wresting it from that purpose, and for the purpose of celebrating in it the service of communities which differed widely from the Church of England. The noble and learned Lord would, no doubt, say that these Services would be Christian, and in no way widely different from those of the Established Church; but the noble and learned Lord had already furnished an answer to that argument, for he had defined a Christian to be anyone calling himself by the name of Christian. It was absurd to maintain that there was no violation of the donors' wishes when there might be celebrated in the churchyards the service of the body which rejected every one of the distinctive doctrines of his own Church. He was glad, however, to believe that his noble and learned Friend's statement was true in a majority of instances. But there was also a widely different spirit abroad—a spirit which might be exemplified by what took place not very long ago in the Paris University. A few months ago, a celebrated writer—a Protestant—was appointed a Professor in Paris. The students of that city were not very fond of dogmas of any kind, and there was a probability that the new Professor would be received with some discontent, because he was suspected of the cardinal vice of Christianity. His defence was—"I am a Christian if you will, but a Christian without dogma and without belief." He (the Marquess of Salisbury) believed that Christians without dogmas and without belief were not so uncommon in this country as some people imagined; it was a fashion which seemed to be increasing. ships, in any similar case, to depart from the principle on which the Government of that day determined that, whatever course might be justifiable, when the representation to such donors was very remote, it was not right to take away entirely from the purposes for which they were given, and devote to other public objects recent gifts to which, if the State made the observance of all the express conditions on which they were given impossible, the donor or his representative might have a moral claim. And in the cases of the Endowed Schools Act and the University Trusts, those also were trusts, constituted by private donation for specific purposes; and what was done was to say that from those specific purposes the endowments should not be withdrawn, if given within the last 60 years, or whatever period it was thought right to take. If such private trusts as the noble Earl opposite (Earl Nelson) had mentioned were constituted for the specific purpose of burial under particular conditions, whether those conditions had reference to the usages of the Church of England or of any other denomination, the argument from the Endowed Schools Act and the University Endowments would apply. But this was a totally different case; and, apart altogether from the construction of certain words in particular Statutes to which his noble Friend had referred, he maintained on broader grounds that it would be fatal to all sound principle of public legislation for their Lordships to sanction the doctrine, that those who had given out and out for public purposes land which was once private property ought to be treated as if they had reserved, or could have reserved, to themselves the right of dictating to Parliament as to how its use for such public purposes should, or should not, be regulated or modified. The additions to churchyards were additions made to that which was the subject of a known public use, regulated, and to be regulated, by public law. If the donors had reserved to themselves some rights of property or some control, which they had not done, they might then possibly have been entitled to say that the grants were to apply to churchyards, only so long as they might continue to be regulated in exactly the same manner as they were at the date of the grants; but to say that the Legislature was to hold its hand and not to be at liberty to use its power of modifying the regulations applicable to such burying grounds after the land had been given out and out without reservation, would be to introduce a principle to the mischief of which there would be no limit. A man who gave property for a road, or for a public park, or for any other public purpose, might come forward and object to all subsequent legislation concerning the manner of regulating it, and might say—“This was not the state of the law when I gave the land, and therefore I object to it.” Why, it would be a clear duty of Parliament to refuse to take gifts from persons on any such conditions as that. Parliament had never accepted them under such limitation of its powers. If the principle were good for churchyards, it would be equally good for churches. It would give every private donor or builder of a church a right of veto, so far as that church was concerned, upon any subsequent alteration by law of the rites and ceremonies, formularies or discipline of the Church of England. They might have private donors, notwithstanding the united authority of Convocation and of Parliament, objecting and saying that they had not contemplated the permission of this thing or of that thing. Against that principle, therefore, he, for one, must steadily set his face, and he hoped their Lordships would do the same. It was perfectly consistent, both with the true legal effect and the real spirit and meaning of the Acts of Parliament which had been referred to, that such a modification as this Bill proposed should be made in the regulations enforced by law as to the manner of performing the service at funerals in grounds given for the purposes of those Acts, if such a modification were thought proper, not as to those grounds by way of exception, but as to churchyards generally. To except grants made within the last 50 or 60 years would also, in practice, lead to endless confusion. In doing so, their Lordships were asked to mark out a line which nobody had ever thought of drawing, defining exactly where an old churchyard began and where it ended; and although the old part might be filled up so that it would be contrary to decency to make additional interments in it, and although the new part might be the only part fit for interments, they were asked in such a case to exclude Dissenters from the rights given under this Bill—from the rights given them in all other churchyards, even although there might be no other consecrated or unconsecrated ground accessible to them in which they could be buried. He protested against this, and repeated that there was no spoliation proposed by the Bill, and no taking away of any of these gifts from the purposes for which they were given.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK thought that the Bill unquestionably gave to Dissenters a right they did not possess at present. In the case of a donor giving a churchyard to the Church of England, under its provisions they were about to take the ground which belonged to one person, and which was given to him for a certain limited number of persons, and they were to increase the number of persons who might use it. It was impossible to admit the argument of the noble and learned Lord, and he would therefore suggest an Amendment of the Amendment proposed by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), one providing that it should only apply to those cases where the donors should have dissented from the application of the Act within six months after its commencement.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that in spite of the favour with which the remarks of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had been received, and in spite of the two recent divisions, he hoped that a little further reflection, and somewhat fuller consideration of the principles involved in the proposition of the noble Marquess, would induce their Lordships to come to the conclusion that it could not possibly be accepted. The noble Marquess had held in his hand a Memorial signed by 300 donors of lands for churchyard purposes, on whose behalf he spoke, their gifts having been made within the last 35 years. But the papers which had been sent round with that Memorial stated that additions had been made to upwards of 15,000 churchyards within the last 50 years. So that, making the noble Marquess a present of 200 donors on account of the difference between 35 and 50 years, he might be said to speak in the name of 500 persons, or 10 per cent of the whole number who had given land for these purposes. And in order to gratify the feelings of this limited number of persons, their Lordships were asked to do that which would mar the symmetry and spoil the completeness of the measure which was proposed to them as a settlement of this important question. He (Lord Brabourne) ventured to say that if they accepted this Amendment for the sake of this limited number of individuals, all of whom were of the higher or richer classes, in a matter which concerned the whole population of England and Wales, such a course would not tend to increase the respect with which their Lordships' decisions were received by the country, whilst it would infallibly prevent the acceptance of this measure by the country as anything like a satisfactory settlement. But yet, if a legal and equitable claim could be established by these persons, he would not venture to ask their Lordships to refuse to recognize that claim, even though its recognition might be attended with some inconvenience. He was, however, prepared to contend that no such claim could be established, whilst its recognition would be attended, not only with great inconvenience, but with consequences most unfortunate and most mischievous to the Church. What was that claim? It was a claim by persons who had given property to a National Institution that they, and not the Parliament of the nation, should still control and regulate the property which they had thus given. He (Lord Brabourne) would not attempt to add anything to the argument of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) upon this point; but he must ask their Lordships to consider that it would be impossible to stop here if they once conceded the principle of the Amendment. Other property besides sites for churchyards had been given to the Church. Many persons had given sites for churches, and had restored, built, and endowed churches at their own cost. Now, there were constant applications to Parliament for alterations in the Rubric or Services of the Church. Only the other day, a noble Lord had presented a number of Petitions praying for some alteration which would put an end to what was called Auricular Confession. Again, it had been proposed that the Athanasian Creed should be expunged from the Church Service; and other changes or relaxations of discipline had been mooted ships, in any similar case, to depart from the principle on which the Government of that day determined that, whatever course might be justifiable, when the representation to such donors was very remote, it was not right to take away entirely from the purposes for which they were given, and devote to other public objects recent gifts to which, if the State made the observance of all the express conditions on which they were given impossible, the donor or his representative might have a moral claim. recognized champions, rather than from her open enemies. What could be more disastrous to the Church than that, for the first time in our history, there should be drawn a line of demarcation across our old churchyards, and that if a stranger should ask its meaning he should be told that on one side reposed the bodies of English Churchmen and on the other the bodies of English Christians? A comparison would be suggested between the claims of the Church on one side and of Christianity on the other—between the claims on one side of a narrow sectarian spirit which sought to perpetuate theological differences after death, and on the other of a broader, more comprehensive, and more Christian spirit, which desired to bury such differences in the grave, and at the last solemn moment of interment to remember only that tie of common Christianity which had bound the living together. In the belief that the proposition of the noble Marquess would do infinite injury to the Church, whilst it would offend the Nonconformists, prevent the settlement of the question, and give rise to heartburnings, litigation, and continued agitation, he earnestly begged their Lordships to reject it by a decisive majority.

Resolved in the Negative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Paupers) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Time of burial to be stated, subject to variation).

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendments were made in the clause:—In page 2, line 12, omit ("time at which") and substitute ("day and hour when"); line 13, omit ("named") and substitute ("stated"); line 18, omit ("eighteen") and substitute ("twenty-four"); line 22, at the beginning of the line, before ("such"), insert these words "or (if such day shall be a Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day) of the day next following"; line 31, add at the end of the clause these words—

" ("Provided also, that no such burial shall take place in any churchyard on Sunday, or on Good Friday or Christmas Day, except by the consent of the person receiving such notice.")

THE EARL OF LIMERICK, in moving an addition to the clause providing that, unless it should be otherwise mutually arranged, no such burial should take place in a churchyard on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or Ascension Day, said, the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had an Amendment to the same effect, except that Ascension Day was not included.

Amendment moved, in page 2, at end of clause, to add—

("And be it further provided that, unless it be otherwise mutually arranged, no such burial shall take place in a churchyard on a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or Ascension Day.")—(The Earl of Limerick.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that under the Amendment he had proposed it was provided that such burials should not take place on Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day. The question as to excluding Ascension Day could be considered before the Report.

EARL CAIRNS thought that Ascension Day should be included in the list.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked, that Ascension Day was not generally observed throughout the country as a festival of the Church; and, therefore, there was no ground for including it in the list.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN observed, that in more than 600 out of the 800 parishes in his diocese Ascension Day was kept as a religious festival.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 31, at the end of the clause, to add—

("Provided also, that no such burial shall take place on a Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day, or on any other day during, or half an hour before or half an hour after, the performance of any Divine service in the church.")—(The Viscount Templetown.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that in cases where the time proposed for burial was inconvenient, the clergyman might himself fix an hour.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Burial to take place accordingly) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Regulations and fees).

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 42, after ("fee") insert ("or offering"); and in line 43, after ("fee") insert ("or offering.")—(The Lord Bishop of Bangor.)

After an explanation by the LORD CHANCELLOR,

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Burial may be with or without religious service).

LORD HOUGHTON moved an Amendment, to insert the words "or Jewish," so as to make it read that

("The burial in the churchyard or graveyard might take place either without any religious service, or with such Christian, or Jewish, and orderly religious service as the persons in charge of the burial might think fit.")

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 5, after ("Christian") insert ("or Jewish.")—(The Lord Houghton.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR regretted that he could not accept the Amendment of his noble Friend, as it would break in upon the principle on which this clause was drawn. The burial grounds referred to in the Bill were places of Christian burial for all parishioners; and unless they were to lose that character, it followed when they came to consider the question of religious services to be performed in them, that they must either have no service in the churchyard, or the service must be Christian. They must draw the line somewhere as to the character of the service. There was no principle on which it could be necessary, or—as he thought—reasonable, to allow Pagan ceremonies or the delivery of secular harangues in a churchyard. And while a Jew, if he were a parishioner, would have a civil right to burial, that right was satisfied if it were silent and without a religious ceremony. It was impossible to admit the religious services of Jews, and to exclude other non-Christian services. The word "Christian" must either stand or go. He preferred that it should stand. It was in accordance with the feelings of almost all religious people that there should be some line drawn, and he knew no other which it was possible to draw. The common law drew the line for him by stating that Christianity was part and parcel of the common law of the land. In point of fact, too, the Jews not only possessed, but decidedly preferred, their own burial grounds; and no single intimation had reached him from any quarter that they desired any alteration to be made, so far as they were concerned, in the Bill. While he had every sympathy with and respect for those who professed the Jewish religion with sincerity, yet he did not think it was necessary on their account to throw down all barriers against that which it was right to exclude.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN observed that the modern Jews made it a fundamental part of their religion to affirm that the promised Messiah was not come; and that, consequently, our blessed Lord, who claimed to be the Messiah, was a deceiver. He, therefore, opposed the Amendment.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he had on several occasions attended Jewish services, and they were conducted with extreme solemnity. There was nothing in them to outrage anyone's feelings. Still he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK moved an Amendment to provide that the persons permitted to read any service should not be in Holy Orders in the Church of England.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 7, after ("persons") insert ("not being in holy orders of the Church of England").—(The Earl of Limerick.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Amendment would exclude any person who had been ordained, but had since left the Church of England.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE asked whether the object of the Amendment was not to prevent one clergyman officiating in the churchyard of another without his consent, where the incumbent was objected to? He could not help thinking some such security ought to be given by the Bill.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that was the object of the Amendment, and, in the hope that the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) would consider the matter before the Report, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendment made, in page 3, line 4, at the beginning of the line before ("having") insert ("so"), and after ("same") insert ("as aforesaid").

Amendment moved, in line 10, at the end of the clause, add—

("The word 'Christian' in this section shall include every religious service used by any church, denomination, or person professing to be Christian.")—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY wished to know whether, if any person were taken to task for conducting improper services in the churchyards, it would be a sufficient plea to say that he was a Churchman, no matter what were his doctrines, or the services which he performed?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it would certainly be understood that any one professing to be Christian was acting in good faith.

EARL CAIRNS said, it was not some recognized service that was required; but the matter was made to depend upon a person professing to be a Christian. He would suggest that the clause should be left as it originally stood.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE wished to know whether a clergyman would have power to prevent a service when he knew that it was to be conducted by a person unfit for the purpose?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that an incumbent would have no power to prevent a service; but anyone offending against the provisions of the Bill might be punished for a misdemeanour. He had put the words upon the Paper for the purpose of avoiding any controversy, as to the doctrines of any service, or of those using it, which some thought (though he did not) might be open under the clause as it now stood, and which it was certainly not desirable to invite or allow.

LORD LILFORD asked the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) and the right rev. Bench if they could give a definition of the difference between the views of a Mahomedan respecting the mission on earth of our Lord Jesus Christ and those of a Unitarian? He (Lord Lilford) thought it would be difficult to give it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY had no doubt it would be difficult, for, in many cases, the Mahomedan had quite as much respect and reverence for Christ as the Unitarian had. The result of the qualifications and modifications which the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had introduced from time to time, had left in his mind the impression that the word Christian represented no substance and no reality, but was simply a species of declaration intended to reconcile without just foundation those to whom the reality was a great matter.

Amendment moved in page 3, at end of clause insert—

"Provided always, that the foregoing clauses of this Act shall only apply to the churchyard or graveyard in any parish or ecclesiastical district where there is no unconsecrated burial ground or cemetery in which the parishioners or inhabitants have rights of burial, and shall cease and determine in respect of any such parish or ecclesiastical district so soon as such unconsecrated burial ground or cemetery has been provided."—(The Earl of Mount Edgumbe.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK opposed the Amendment.

On Question? Resolved in the Affirmative.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER in moving, as an Amendment to the clause, the addition of the words—"Provided that no such religious service shall last more than 30 minutes," said, that he did not know how decorum could be preserved unless some limitation of time of services was agreed upon. The Church of England service did not last more than a quarter of an hour. But at Nonconformist funerals addresses were likely to be delivered and hymns sung. Sometimes two or three addresses might be delivered—on such an occasion, for example, as the presence of a popular and eloquent minister. He had, when he was a clergyman in Cornwall, witnessed scenes which showed the danger of this. Funeral processions sometimes used to travel five miles, and the mourners sang hymns (often very beautiful hymns) until they came to the churchyard. The law would not permit this, and he had often been kept waiting an hour. He looked upon his Amendment as one conducive to peace, and calculated to prevent disorder. In some circumstances, no doubt, if there were no pressure of time or duties, a sensible clergyman would relax the rule as to time. For himself, he would not insist upon half an hour; but he would like to have a limit of time fixed. He had often known funerals where disagreeable occurrences took place, and unless some time was mentioned for the service much inconvenience might be experienced.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 10, at end of clause add—

("Provided that, unless it shall be otherwise mutually arranged, no such religious service shall last more than thirty minutes.")—(The Lord Bishop of Winchester.)

LORD WAVENEY objected to the Amendment, and thought that everything ought to be left to the good feeling of the people and the solemnity of the occasion.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that it would be very easy to make arrangements with pious Nonconformist ministers; but other persons of quite a different character might have the conduct of funerals, and therefore it would be well that a time should be limited for the service. It was represented to him the long services might lead to some collision.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he was clearly in favour of investing the clergy with the power of determining how long the services should last. In that view, he would urge that power in the matter should be given to the incumbent.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE was of opinion that the Amendment would place the clergy in a most invidious position, and make the Bill still more unpalatable to them. Nothing could be more unfortunate than that the clergyman should have to negotiate with the friends of the deceased person as to the length of the service. Again, the services might be led sometimes by women, and he should like to know how a woman was to be stopped?

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the Amendment would be a good thing as a general direction; but he did not see how it was to be carried out.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought it would be wiser to trust to the power of the clergymen, under the 3rd clause of the Bill, to fix a time which would leave a reasonable margin, so as to avoid any risk of practical inconvenience. It would be impossible, if parties came not quite punctually, or if they exceeded the limited time, as with extempore services might be very liable to happen, to stop the funeral before it came naturally to an end. To protract the service unreasonably could not be for the convenience of those concerned. If a maximum time were fixed, it might soon be regarded in practice as a minimum; and, in that case, it would be habitually exceeded.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Burials to be conducted in a decent and orderly manner, and without obstruction).

LORD WAVENEY moved, as an Amendment, in lines 15 to 18, to omit certain words which accounted as a misdemeanour the delivery of an address, not being part of or incidental to a religious service permitted by the Act, in a graveyard or churchyard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR appealed to the noble Lord not to press the Amendment. The words were intended to exclude secular addresses.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Act not to give right of burial where no previous right existed) agreed to.

Clause 9 (Burials Under Act to be registered).

On the Motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendments made:—In page 3, line 29, at the beginning of the line, before ("having") insert the word ("so") and after ("burial") insert ("as aforesaid"); line 31, instead of ("Schedule (A.)") insert ("Schedule (B.)"); line 40, after ("thereof") add these words—

("Such entry, instead of stating by whom the ceremony of burial was performed, shall state by whom the same has been certified under this Act.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Liberty to use burial service of Church of England in unconsecrated ground).

On the Motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendment made to the clause:—

In page 4, line 10, at the end of the clause add these words ("The relative, friend, or legal representative, having charge of or being responsible for the burial of any deceased person who had a right of interment in any such unconsecrated ground vested in any burial board, or provided under any Act relating to the burial of the dead, shall be entitled, if he think fit, to have such burial performed therein according to the rites of the Church of England by any minister of the said church who may be willing to perform the same."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 (Relief of clergy of Church of England from penalties in certain cases).

On the Motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR the following Amendments made:—

In Page 4, line 21, instead of ("Schedule B.") insert ("Schedule C."); line 23, after ("whereas") add ("such of"); lines 23 and 24, omit ("except that numbered 2 in the schedule hereto,") and substitute ("as are numbered 1, 3, 4, and 5 in the said Schedule C."); line 35, instead of ("Schedule B.") insert ("Schedule C."); line 37, at the end of the clause add these words—

("Provided also that the word 'crime' in the said Schedule C. shall mean only an offence against the criminal law of this realm").

EARL CAIRNS said, that he entertained a great objection to the clause, and doubted whether it should pass. It professed to follow the Letters of Business and the action of Convocation; but it did not in reality follow them at all. The recommendations of Convocation suggested an alteration of the rubric of the Book of Common Prayer; but the clause did not effect an alteration of the rubric. The Bill introduced into the Schedule a supposititious and hypothetical rubric which had no existence, could have none, and was never intended to have any. It said that, supposing there was such an imaginary rubric, the clergyman who acted under it should be absolved from any penalties for not obeying the rubric which did exist. He would still remain under the moral obligations imposed by the actual rubric; but he would be absolved from the legal penalties attached to disobeying it, on the hypothesis that some other rubric might exist, but which did not exist in fact. That did not seem to him to be quite a satisfactory mode of legislating. Parliament was absolutely deprived, under the clause, of its legitimate power of considering the recommendations of Convocation, and, if necessary, of modifying and altering them. It recited, and truly recited, that Convocation had made certain recommendations, which were mentioned in the Schedule; but their Lordships could not exercise the right of altering a single word in the Schedule from beginning to end. He asked whether his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack was able to produce, in the whole history of Parliaments, any instance in which such a course had ever been taken before? If the rubric was to be altered, it should be done by a law as clear and unequivocal as that which it was proposed to alter. The recommendation of Convocation was that on the request or with the consent of the kindred or the friends of the deceased it should be lawful to administer the following service of burial. Kindred or friends—which was it to be? If the kindred thought one way and the friends another, who was to prevail? Supposing the friends had one view of the life and character of the deceased, and of what should be the service at his burial, and the kindred had another, were the votes to be taken and the heads counted? Again, who were the friends? The question was one involving penalties which a Court of Law might be called upon to enforce; and was it possible that Parliament could deal with a law imposing a penalty in such a fashion as that? There were very grave objections to the clause; and he hoped that before the Bill reached a further stage these objections would be considered.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he could not concur with the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) in his criticism of the clause, and maintained that the rubric in the Schedule was properly constituted. If the rubrics could never be altered, then the noble and learned Earl's objection would have force. The law practically was broken now, and the incumbent said—"I am legally bound to read the whole of the service as it stands; but there are words in it which do not apply to your people, and I cannot use them. I mean to leave out one or two portions." That was the kind of case with which their Lordships had to deal. The noble and learned Earl, he was sure, was most sensitive as to the rights of the clergy; but there was on this matter a pressure which was quite intolerable. It was a matter connected with the churchyard; and when they were dealing very hardly with the clergy, why did they not afford them the relief they could easily afford them? There was great need of some relief; and they were only asked to give a very moderate relief to the clergy, from whom they had taken much. He maintained that when such a rubric as that proposed was passed by Parliament it became law, and was binding on the Church.

EARL CAIRNS said, this was not at all the case.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK contended that it was in this manner the whole Book of Common Prayer and the rubrics had come into existence. As to the noble and learned Earl's objection that the words "kindred or friends" conveyed a vague or ambiguous meaning, he asked the Committee not to be led away by subtleties and fine distinctions. The plain meaning of "kindred or friends" was those persons having charge of the funeral, and who alone would have the power to deal with the incumbent.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, his most rev. Brother had referred to ancient instances of the manner in which rubrics were formed, and obtained the sanction of law. He would direct the noble and learned Earl's attention to parallel modern cases. In the Lectinary Bill and the Occasional Services Bill, it would be found that that which was sanctioned by Convocation was afterwards approved by Parliament and obtained a legal sanction. He did not understand why the rules regulating the burial of the dead could not be altered in the same way. He was convinced that the noble and learned Earl was anxious that the clergy should be relieved from the great difficulty in which they were placed in this matter. He repudiated the idea that the Bill was only intended to enable persons who were not members of the Church of England to use services different from our own in our burial grounds. He had insisted on a former occasion that there was a number of persons who, being desirous of being buried by a clergyman of the Church of England in churchyards were not allowed so to be buried because of certain rubrics which at present existed, and he pointed out that Convocation had reported that some relief ought to be given in this matter. In consequence of that report, the noble and learned

Lord (the Lord Chancellor) desired that the clergy should be incidentally relieved; and he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) altogether protested against the idea which would sever the two parts.

EARL CAIRNS observed, that the effect of the clause would be by a side wind to make an alteration in the rubrics of the Church of England. The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York) seemed to think that the Bill proposed to alter the rubrics; but that was exactly what it did not do, and that was exactly what he complained of. The cases he had cited were all instances in which the rubrics had been altered; but here it was proposed that the rubrics should remain, but that the penalties for its non-observance should be removed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR characterized the argument which they had just heard from his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) as a technical one. It was, in fact, super-hyper extra technical. In the case of the Shortened Service Act the same course, in substance, was followed as was followed in this case. None of the existing rubrics were altered by that Act; but it authorized many deviations from them by the clergy, in the performance of divine service, and the clergy, of all schools, had found no difficulty in acting upon that authority. With respect to the criticisms of his noble and learned Friend upon the substance of the clause, he could only say that they all appeared to him to rest upon false assumptions as to its effect. The Convocations and the clergy were not asking to be allowed to sit in judgment on Dissenters or others. All that was now proposed was that where the law did not permit of any service being used, the clergyman might, with the consent of the friends, use another service taken from the Prayer Book or the Bible; and that, where the clergyman now was required by law to use the full service, he might for the future, if the relatives or friends approved of it (not otherwise), use a shortened service, from which certain prayers, generally objected to by Dissenters, and which in some cases were the cause of conscientious scruples by the clergy, might be omitted. There would be no difficulty about the persons to give the consent; the term "relatives or friends" would mean, as in the rest of the Bill, those who had the charge of,

and were responsible for, the burial. He hoped that neither in this House, nor the other, would they be induced to disregard the wishes or the conscientious scruples of the clergy. The House could relieve the Nonconformists of the disabilities imposed upon them by law; and they could also in this way, to some very moderate extent, relieve the clergy of the disabilities imposed upon them by law. If they were to enter upon the question of altering the Prayer Book they launched into an interminable controversy. It would be most harsh—he had almost said it would be most unjust—to the clergy if this provision were not allowed to remain in the Bill, for the most bitter taunts had been from time to time levelled at them by Dissenters on account of the unsuitability of the Burial Service under certain circumstances.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD supported the clause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would consider whether some improvement could not be made in it upon the Report to meet the difficulties suggested by his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns).

LORD ORANMORE and BROWNE complained that the clause gave permission to the clergy to use any hymns and anthems at their discretion; that in the last edition of Hymns Ancient and Modern there was one hymn invoking the intercession of Saints, and others by like invocation of the Virgin. Considering the contempt of the law shown by Mr. Mackonochie and other, it appeared to him that the clergy of the Church of England should be restrained, instead of encouraging a lawless spirit by such enactments as were contained in this clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Application of Act), and Clause 13 (Short title of Act), severally agreed to.

Schedules A and B read, and agreed to.

On the Motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendments made:—

In page 5, after ("Schedules to which this Act refers") insert a new Schedule to be headed ("SCHEDULE A."), as follows:—

Notice of Burial.

I , of , being the relative [or friend, or legal representative as the case may be, describing the relation, if a relative,] having the charge of or being responsible for the burial of A.B., of , who died at in the parish of , on the day of , do hereby give you notice that it is intended by me that the body of the said A.B. shall be buried within the [here describe the churchyard or graveyard in which the body is to be buried,] on the day of at the hour of , without the performance in the manner prescribed by law of the service for the burial of the dead according to the rites of the Church of England, and I give this notice pursuant to the "Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880."

To the Rector [or, as the case may be,] of Page 5, line 2, for ("Schedule A.") substitute ("Schedule B."); line 9, for ("Schedule B.") substitute ("Schedule C."); page 6, line 19, omit all the words from ("8. Insert, &.") down to the end of the Schedule inclusive.

Postponed Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 86.)

House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

MR. RITCHIE, in rising to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time upon that day three months, said, he was aware that in proposing to ask the House to reject a Private Bill upon the second reading, he was doing that which was not always a convenient course to pursue. He was quite aware of the inconvenience of asking the House to come to a decision on a question of this kind; but, at the same time, he hoped the House, if sufficient cause was shown for rejecting a Bill, would not part with its right to do so. He believed that in this case he should be perfectly able to show sufficient reason why the House should not consent to the second reading of the Bill. He should content himself with very few words, for he did not propose to detain the House at any length. In a very few words he thought he should be able to show the House that a proposition was contained in the present Bill which was of an altogether unprecedented nature, and one which fully justified him in asking the House not to give the Bill a second reading. The ground upon which he rested his argument was one which required no evidence. It was one which required no investigation, and it was one upon which the House could have no difficulty whatever in coming to a conclusion without any great amount of argument. There was an Act of Parliament which was passed in the year 1845, called the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which was passed for the purpose of securing uniformity in the provisions of Private Bills so far as compensation was concerned. It applied to the provisions of all such Private Bills as that which was now before the House of Commons, and naturally all those whose property was at all likely to be interfered with felt secure that under the provisions of that Act they were protected from certain proceedings on the part of the promoters of these Bills which were calculated prejudicially to affect the rights of private property. But the Bill which the House was now asked to read a second time proposed for the first time, he thought, altogether to set aside a very important clause in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and to go under and take portions of premises without the promoters of the Bill being compelled to take the whole. As he had already intimated, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was passed in 1845 for the purpose of securing uniformity in the various Acts relative to the acquisition of lands for undertakings or works of a public nature; and Section 92 said—

"Be it enacted that no party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house, or other building, or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof."

He did not know whether hon. Members had in their hands the Bill which it was now proposed to read a second time. If they had, by turning to Clause 10, they would find the following words:—

"With respect to any houses or buildings which the two Companies are by the provisions of the Act of 1879 or this Act authorized to enter on, take, and use, for purposes of the railways, and under which, or any part of which, or the premises connected therewith, it is proposed that the railways shall be made; the two Companies shall not be required to take those houses, buildings, or premises, or the site thereof, but the two Companies may appropriate and use the soil or ground lying under any such houses, buildings, or premises, or under any part or parts thereof respectively, and may purchase, and the owners of such houses, buildings, and premises respectively, shall, if required, sell to the two Companies an easement to use for making and maintaining the railway, so much of the said soil or ground as they may require for those purposes, and the purchase of any such easement shall not in any case be deemed the purchase of a part of a house, or other building, or manufactory, within Section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845."

This was the clause which it was proposed to insert in the Bill for the benefit of the promoters of the measure; and in order to enable them to pay a somewhat larger dividend to their shareholders this clause proposed to repeal the restricting section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. It might be said that those who were interested in the matter would have their remedy by appearing and giving evidence before the Committee upstairs upon the question; but he took it that there were many people interested in such a matter as this who would not, even if they desired it, have any locus standi before the Committee. He took it that the inhabitants of the district as inhabitants, the occupiers of houses as occupiers, would have no locus standi before the Committee; but even if they did have a locus standi he contended that it was not fair, it was not just, and it was not expedient that these people should be required to go to the serious expense of appearing before a Committee in order to defend the position which had been given to them by an Act of Parliament in 1845 for the express purpose of providing against any such action as that which was now proposed by the present Bill. He contended, however, that there were many interested in this matter who had no locus standi, and who would receive no compensation, although materially affected by the proposals contained in the Bill. The occupier of a house or building under which it was proposed to run this railway by this Bill would have no claim whatever to any kind of compensation; and it was specially on their behalf that he asked the House of Commons to reject altogether such an unprecedented proposition as that which was now placed before them. But on the part of the owners of property who would have a locus standi, and whom it was proposed in some shadowy way to compensate, he maintained that they had no right to be asked to come before a Committee of the House of Commons and incur the large expense that would be entailed in defending the rights which had been conferred upon them by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. They had no right to be called upon by this Railway Company for their own purposes to part with the foundations of their houses, so that for all future time they would be unable to deal with them on the simple understanding that they would have some claim to moderate compensation. He was very unwilling indeed to trespass on the time of the House at any length at such an hour of the day. He hoped he had stated sufficient broadly to enable the House to come to a conclusion that this was a Bill which ought not to be read a second time. It was a Bill of such an exceptional nature that he thought the House would be justified in throwing it out on the second reading. He had just had placed in his hands the case of the promoters of the Bill; but a perusal of it led him to the conclusion that it did not alter in one iota the force of the objections he had stated to the House. The case of the promoters simply amounted to this—"We ask the House of Commons, by giving us these extraordinary powers, to enable us to give to our shareholders a larger amount of dividend than we would be able otherwise to do." Upon this ground alone the House was asked to legislate for this Company on other lines than those which all other underground railways in this Metropolis had hitherto been required to go upon. It was one question to say whether negotiations might not be entered into with the owners of property as to whether they were willing to allow a Railway Company to go under their property without requiring them to take the whole of it; but it was altogether a different thing to say by Act of Parliament that they should not have the power of refusing, but should be compelled to part with their rights of property. And for what purpose was this exceptional privilege to be conferred? Simply for the purpose of enabling a private Company to pay a larger dividend to their shareholders; and in order to do that the House of Commons was asked to set aside an Act of Parliament on which all Bills of this nature had hitherto been based. He begged, in conclusion, to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN regretted that, once again in the new Parliament, he should be called upon to trouble the House, even for a moment, in defending the rights of Petitioners for Private Bills. In the old Parliament he had had to defend those rights over and over again; and, with only one exception, the House had permitted the promoters of Private Bills to introduce their scheme. Having exercised the Constitutional right of presenting a Petition, and having had the prayer of that Petition granted by the first reading of their Bill, it was altogether unjust and unfair to refuse to those Petitioners, whose Petition had been granted by the House, the right of having their case heard by a Committee upstairs, that Committee being practically the House itself. This was nothing more nor less than an attempt upon the part of the opponents of the Bill to stop a great public work. The hon. Member (Mr. Ritchie) said—and it was a very cheap assertion to make—that the object of the Bill was to contravene the provisions of an Act of Parliament in order to increase the dividends of a private Company. He (Sir Edward Watkin) begged to say that it was nothing of the kind. Certainly, before the hon. Member came to the House and troubled them, at that inconvenient hour of the day, by laying down the law upon the question, he ought to have made himself acquainted with what the law actually was. He seemed to be under the impression that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 had never been modified or altered since it was first enacted. But Parliament, in dealing with underground railways, had already given the promoters of Private Bills power to take any part of any premises outside the principal walls of a house, and power to underpin the house without taking the house at all. In this case it was simply proposed to give an extension of that principle, and to say that, if the promoters did not wish to incur the wasteful expense of pulling property down when engineering skill would enable them to do so without inflicting such demolition of property, they might burrow under the property, compensating for all damage to everyone affected. The hon. Member ought, in fairness, to have said that compensation was provided by the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, he had made that statement. He had said that the owners of property were promised some kind of compensation by the clause.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN wished the House clearly to understand that compensation was provided in the Bill both for the owner and the tenant. The work which it was proposed to sanction by the measure was of a very exceptional nature. It was the completion of the Underground Railway by adding a mile of railway between the Mansion House Station and High Street, Aldgate. The line passed through a very important part of the City of London, and if it could not be made cheaply it would not be made at all. The question then was, was the line to be made or not? Were they going to refuse the promoters the right to be heard before a Committee upstairs? He was prepared to submit, as far as he was concerned, to the decision of the House; but he did not believe that the House would be prepared to stop a great and important public work, and refuse to read the Bill a second time, because some Gentlemen in the City of London wanted to have the whole of their premises taken, and to saddle the promoters with a wasteful expenditure, instead of being compensated for the actual injury they sustained. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would reject the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and read the Bill a second time.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, it seemed somewhat strange that the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) should have spoken so strongly in favour of the Bill, of its urgent necessity, and the injustice that would be done to the promoters by rejecting it, when it was well known that the hon. Member had been for many years an opponent of this very line.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN rose to Order. The statement of the hon. and gallant Member, who was a director of the railway in 1874, was entirely out of Order, and was altogether unfounded.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, that unless the Speaker ruled that he was out of Order, he would repeat what he had stated—that the hon. Member for Hythe had himself been one of the chief obstacles to the completion of this line from the time it was first projected in 1874, under the name of the Inner Circle Completion Railway, which was a proposal to continue the line from the Mansion House Station to the thickly populated parts of the City about Mincing Lane; and as the hon. Member for Hythe was Chairman of the South Eastern Railway Company, he did not wish to see this line completed, as it would draw away some of the traffic on that line between Cannon Street and Charing Cross. The hon. Member said it was quite irregular, or very nearly so, to prevent a Petition for a Private Bill from going to a Committee. He (Captain Aylmer) was sorry to detain the House even for a moment; but he wished to point out that there was a precedent for the course now proposed to be taken by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) in regard to the Bill. The hon. Member for Hythe brought in a Bill in 1876, which contained a clause of exactly the same nature as one in the present Bill; but it was opposed and rejected on the second reading. The present Bill proposed that interest on capital should be paid out of capital, and the Bill of 1876 had a clause to the same effect; and, although it was promoted by the hon. Gentleman, the House rejected it upon the second reading upon that ground. He (Captain Aylmer) thought the House would be justified in rejecting the present Bill for the same reason. The principle it involved was one of an exceptionally dangerous character; and if the House rejected the Bill it would simply be following the precedent which had already been established. It ought also to be rejected because it was an attempt to override an Act passed last Session, in which certain conditions were laid down in regard to another scheme, which conditions were not carried out in the present measure. Upon these grounds he seconded the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets for the rejection of the Bill.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that setting aside the question between the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) and the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin), as to whether there were rival schemes for the completion of this line of railway, the question they had really to consider was, whether the objections that had been taken to the Bill were in themselves objections to the ordinary practice of the House with regard to Private Bills, and should induce the House to stop the measure now instead of leaving it to a Committee to deal with the Bill when it came in the ordinary course before them. He should not have risen to take part in the debate if it had not been for the circumstance that the completion of this Inner Circle was an object of the greatest possible importance to the division he had the honour to represent of a neighbouring county to the Metropolis. Business men who had long been anxious for the completion of the Inner Circle saw the contests which were going on between different Railway Companies to prevent what would be a great public work with the greatest possible regret; and he ventured to say that the question was one of such deep importance to the general commercial world, and of such especial importance to people engaged in commerce who lived in the county which he had the honour to represent, that he thought hon. Members should pause before they adopted a course which was seldom attempted in that House—namely, that of rejecting a Private Bill upon the second reading, and of not allowing it to go before a Select Committee for its merits to be sifted, and for the opponents to be heard in the ordinary way. He sincerely trusted that the House would not adopt the course suggested by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, but would consent to read the Bill a second time.

MR. ROWLEY HILL had no desire to interfere with the passing of a measure to promote a great public improvement; but, at the same time, he thought that it was highly important for the House to maintain the rights of the owners of property to whom Parliament in its wisdom had given protection. This Bill, as far as he understood its provisions, proposed not merely to complete the Inner Circle Railway, but also to abolish and get rid of some very important provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which were enacted for the protection of the owners of property. The hon. Baronet who proposed the second reading of the Bill (Sir Edward Watkin) did not pretend to say that the measure conferred the rights it sought in a way which had ever been attempted before. Although Parliament in some cases had allowed the underpinning of walls, this Bill went much further, and allowed an easement to be acquired under the houses beneath which the line was to pass. In this way very valuable property in the City might be destroyed, and the continuity of premises interfered with in a very important manner. He, therefore, trusted that the House would be of opinion that it was due to themselves to stand by the rule they had themselves laid down for the protection of the owners of property, and that they would not consent to set it aside by reading the Bill a second time. It was true that the opponents would have an opportunity of going before a Committee upstairs; but what right had any Railway Company to ask that individuals should be put to the cost of appearing before a Committee to protect the rights which Parliament had conferred upon them? These rights were granted by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845; and he trusted that Parliament would now send the Bill back again to its promoters with an intimation that if they desired to pass it they must bring it in again without these objectionable clauses. The hon. Baronet who moved the second reading of the Bill himself admitted that it involved an injustice to the owners of property, because he said that it would enable the line to be made in a cheaper manner than other lines had been able to be made. And how was the cheapening to be effected? Why, by robbing the owners of private property. He hoped the House would stand by the owners of private property, and not allow a Railway Company to exercise these tyrannical powers over them. This Company had for many years past been serving notices of various kinds upon the owners of property, which left such owners in a state of uncertainty with regard to the valuable property they possessed, and prevented them from dealing with it to the advantage they might otherwise have done if there had been no element of uncertainty. In the end, the Acts which had been obtained had not been carried out. He trusted the House would reject the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had justly drawn the attention of the House to a peculiarity in the present Bill which did not yet exist in any of the Acts passed by that House. The peculiarity was that the railway might burrow under a house without the directors being compelled of necessity to buy the whole house under which they burrowed. But the question before the House at present was whether this new power should be carefully considered by a Select Committee, or whether the House should reject the second reading of the Bill. It was, undoubtedly, a new power, which the House had never before given. It had given power to burrow under cellars, and to underpin the walls of a house; but, at the present moment, there was no power to burrow under a house itself. Still, though this was a new power, as the attention of the House had been drawn to it, the Select Committee would carefully consider it on its merits, and would be able to advise the House, with a full knowledge of the circumstances, whether it was wise that this power should be given by an Act of Parliament. There was another power to which the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) had referred, and that was also peculiar to this Bill—namely, that interest should be given to capital during the course of construction. It was true that the clause did not profess to pay interest out of capital, but out of some reserve fund. As paying interest on capital during construction was against the spirit of Standing Order 167, the Select Committee would be required to consider that clause also. There was nothing, so far as he saw, in considering this Bill, as Chairman of Committees, which induced him to advise the House to refuse the second reading of the measure. But if it was referred to a Select Committee, he thought they should carefully consider these two points as well as another clause referring to the limits of deviation.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Lyon Playfair) told the House there were peculiarities connected with the present Bill, although he did not see anything to prevent them from reading the Bill a second time, even although it contained clauses that were shown to be of a very exceptional character. He believed that this was the first time that clauses of this kind had ever been introduced into any Railway Bill whatever. Last year the Bill promoted by the Metropolitan Railway and the Metropolitan District Railway was sent upstairs and very ably argued there. It met with very great opposition, and it was thought that the Railway Companies had made an excellent bargain before the Committee upstairs. They were enabled to pass certain new clauses that were strongly objected to; but he was certain that if the Bill of last year had contained this clause—Clause 10—the measure would never have been passed at all. The objection which he entertained to the Bill now was to the principle that a Railway Company should come before Parliament with a Bill in one Session, and after it had been ably discussed upstairs, alterations made, and the Bill passed into law, and after having carried on negotiations with the Metropolitan Board of Works, and with the authorities of the City of London, in reference to the contributions to be paid towards the formation of the new street, and finding that they were not able to come to an agreement with them, should introduce another Bill at the next Session of Parliament with entirely different provisions. He might mention in connection with this railway that the completion of the Inner Circle was admitted to be of great importance by everyone. At the same time, there was connected with the completion of the Railway the formation of a new street which was of equal importance, and which was to open up a communication between the West and the East Ends of the Metropolis. The combination of the two schemes was part of the arrangement sanctioned by the Committee upstairs. Clauses were inserted in the Bill for carrying out this arrangement between the Railway Companies, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the authorities of the City of London. Negotiations had been going on, and various sums had been mentioned in connection with the works between the three parties to the arrangement—the Metropolitan Board of Works on the one part, the Corporation of the City of London on the second part, and the Metropolitan Railway Company and the Metropolitan District Railway Company on the third part. They had not yet been able to agree upon all the points, although they had been coming somewhat nearer together. It seemed that two of the parties undertook the responsibility of paying the other party a certain specified sum of money. Under these circumstances, he held that it was too bad for the Railway Companies, after having obtained the passing of their former Bill, and not having been able to complete the negotiations, to object to the arrangement in regard to the new street. It was unfair for the Railway Companies to say now—"We will make the railway without the new street; we will burrow under your houses, and go to Parliament and ask them for power to complete our railway, leaving you to do what you like with regard to the new street." The new street was of quite as much importance to the inhabitants of the Metropolis as the completion of the Inner Circle Railway. The Railway Companies were to have the advantage of making their railway under that new street, and the arrangement would be of mutual benefit to the three parties. If properly carried out, it would be of benefit to the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Corporation of London as well as to the Railway Companies. It would be of benefit to the Board of Works and the Corporation of London to have the new street, and it would be of benefit to the Railway Companies to have their railway completed. In all probability, if the Railway Companies were allowed to have recourse to a new arrangement, the opportunity of forming a new street would be lost. If the House threw out the present Bill he had not the slightest doubt in the world that an arrangement would be come to that would be satisfactory to all the parties concerned. Therefore he urged that if the House was disposed at any time to sanction the principle of enabling a Railway Company to burrow under private property, this was not the time for establishing such a principle, and it was not the time for permitting a Railway Company to bring in a new Bill with a fresh clause setting aside the arrangement which had been made and completed. He had thought that the House had seen the last of everything connected with the completion of the Inner Circle Railway. If the House consented to pass the present Bill, he had no doubt that the Railway Company would bring in another little Bill next year. The Corporation of the City of London and the other authorities opposed the Bill, and he called upon the House to reject it. In that event he had no doubt they would soon find that a great improvement would take place in the arrangements, without troubling a Committee upstairs to discuss this or that peculiar feature of the scheme. The Bill was simply brought in to enable the Railway Company to add a clause to their former Bill conferring powers on the Company which they had not dared to ask for in their original scheme. He hoped the House would reject the second reading of the Bill and refuse to give the power now

MR. EVANS said, the whole matter was fully argued before the Select Committee last year. The Bill then brought forward was a very important one, and several of the questions mooted to-day had been raised before that Committee, and in principle adopted. The Committee consented to allow the underpinning of walls and cellars without requiring the Railway Company to take the whole of the premises; but, on the other hand, they refused to entertain the question without also including the proposal for the formation of a new street. He thought that, in all probability, if the new street had been left out of the Bill altogether, it was very doubtful whether the Committee would have passed the Preamble of the Bill. It was, therefore, a very important point to consider now. What had been said about the underpinning of houses was a matter that was not brought before the Committee, although the question of underpinning cellars and walls was; and it was, therefore, impossible for him to say what view the Committee might have taken upon that point. Still, he thought, with the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means, that it was a proper question to be submitted to a Committee upstairs; and he therefore ventured to suggest that the House should assent to the second reading of the Bill, with the view of having that question carefully considered by a Committee, and it was certain to be fully and ably argued before them. The new street was quite another matter, and he very much doubted indeed whether any Committee would consent to the abandonment of that portion of the scheme.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

CAPTAIN AYLMER, in moving—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill to consider and Report on the course taken by the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railway Companies, the Promoters of the Bill, in carrying into effect the powers of 'The Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railways Act, 1879,' and 'The Metropolitan said; he thought, after the remarks which had been made by the Chairman of the Committee which sat upon the Bill last year, that the House would consent to the reference which he now proposed. The same thing was done last year, and it was desirable that the new Committee which was to sit upon the present Bill should have before them all the facts connected with the great improvement which the Corporation of the City of London regarded as of so much importance. He would not detain the House longer, but would simply move the Instruction of which he had given Notice. The first part of it was agreed to by the House last year when the Bill was sent to a Committee upstairs, so that the whole of the subject might be fully considered. The last part required one or two remarks from him. When the Bill was considered last year, and the Preamble was declared to have been proved, it was ordered to run alongside of another Bill, and his object was to secure that the same course should be followed now.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill to consider and report on the course taken by the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railway Companies, the Promoters of the Bill, in carrying into effect the powers of 'The Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railway Act, 1879,' and 'The Metropolitan Inner Circle Completion Act 1874,' and also the expediency of granting an extension of time for the purchase of land for the line authorised by the Act of 1874 above-mentioned."—(Captain Aylmer.)

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, the hon. and gallant Member was a little more inaccurate in the statement he had just made than he was a little time ago. He should, however, like to ask the authorities of the House if there was any precedent for an Instruction of the kind proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) has put a question on a point of Order. I see no objection, as far as the Forms of the House are concerned, technically speaking, in the proposition which the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) has submitted.

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

No explanation was offered to us as to the reasons why no attempt even to prove those charges was made, notwithstanding they had never been withdrawn.

And no observation was addressed to us by Mr. Monk's Counsel, which indicated to our minds that he was surprized at the course adopted, and at the sudden abandonment of the Petition so far as it affected Mr. Monk.

Moreover, after our judgment was given declaring Mr. Monk to have been duly elected, Mr. Monk's Counsel made no application for his costs, which we were prepared to award him had he asked for them, as we intimated to him; but he declined to make any application upon the subject.

Under these circumstances we are not satisfied that the abandonment of the case against Mr. Monk was not the result of an arrangement made with the view of withholding from us the evidence of the extensive corrupt practices which there is reason to believe had taken place at the Election.

Given under our hands, this 15th day of June 1880.

C. E. POLLOCK.
H. HAWKINS.

To the Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

And the said Report, together with the said Certificates and Reports, were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—OUT-DOOR RELIEF (IRELAND).

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the terms of the Local Government Board Circular of the 1st June 1880, requiring, as a condition for the receipt of out-door relief by the able-bodied, that each person shall do eight hours labour; and, whether he will modify the above conditions and assimilate them to those in force in England, by leaving it to the discretion of the guardians to require the labour test?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have seen the Circular referred to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, and I must say that the Order now in force is similar to one issued during the famine of 1846. The hon. Member is not altogether correct in thinking that there is no discretion in the hands of Boards of Guardians, the words "so far as practicable," qualifying the condition. I fear the labour test is necessary.

LOWER THAMES VALLEY—MAIN SEWAGE BOARD.

MR. CUBITT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has arrived at any decision respecting the sewage scheme of the Lower Thames Valley Main Sewage Board; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the official Reports of the inspectors upon it?

MR. DODSON: The Department has recently received the Report of the Inspector, which has been referred back to him for some further information. The matter will receive my attention as early as practicable; but the question is one of unusual importance and involving interests of great magnitude, and it cannot be disposed of without the most careful consideration. When a decision has been arrived at I will see whether the Report can be laid on the Table; but it is not usual to do so, as these Reports are intended for the guidance of the Board only. If the Report is laid on the Table, a similar course must be adopted with the Evidence, which extended over more than 40 days.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT—EXAMINATIONS AND REWARDS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has observed the fact disclosed in the published accounts of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland for the period from October 1878 to December 1879, that it has cost £11,227 in expense of administration to distribute £11,987 in exhibitions, prizes, and fees, and that a balance of £9,987 of the income for the period has been left unused by the Board; and, whether steps will be taken to secure a better administration than that which applies but one-third of the income for the purposes contemplated by this Statute, whilst another third is absorbed in the cost of administration, and the remaining third is not employed at all?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have seen the accounts to which the hon. Member refers. I would remind him that the Intermediate Education Act has two objects—namely, the carrying out of the system of public examinations and the linson Ratcliff, the Member whose Return and Election were complained of in the said Petition was not duly elected, and that his Election and Return were void, because he, by his Agent, one William Edmund Ballinger, was guilty of bribery at and before the said Election.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election to which the Petition refers, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

That, upon the trial of the said Petition, no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of either of the Candidates at the said Election.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we further report that the persons who were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices, namely, bribery at the said Election, are, William Edmund Ballinger, William Spiers Wilson Brotherton, Thomas Taylor, and David Plumb.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we report that, upon the evidence before us to which we have confined our attention, there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said Election to which the said Petition relates.

Given under our hands this 15th day of June 1880.

C. E. POLLOCK.
H. HAWKINS.

To the Right Honourable
The Speaker of
The House of Commons.

CITY OF GLOUCESTER ELECTION.

In the matter of the City of Gloucester Election Petition.

We, Sir Charles Edward Pollock, knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and Sir Henry Hawkins, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880, certify that upon the 9th day of June instant (1880), we duly held a Court within the City of Gloucester for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for that City between Edmund Digby Worsley, James Franklin, and George Twyford, Petitioners; and Thomas Robinson and Charles James Monk, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify that at the conclusion of the said trial we determined that the said Thomas Robinson, one of the Members whose Return and Election were complained of in the said Petition, was not duly elected, and that his Election and Return were void, because he, by his Agent, one John Clement Morris, was guilty of bribery at and before the said Election, and that the said Charles James Monk, the other of the said Members whose Return and Election were complained of in the said Petition, was duly elected and returned.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election to which the Petition

refers, we in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

That upon the trials of the said Petition no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any or either of the Candidates at the said Election.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we further report that the persons who were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices, namely, of bribery at and before the said Election, are:—

John Clement Morris, Joseph Stoddart, and Thomas Meadows.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we report that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the Petition relates.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we specially report the following matters which arose in the course of the trial, an account of which in our judgment ought to be submitted to the House of Commons.

The Petition was presented against the said Thomas Robinson and Charles James Monk jointly, and charged them jointly and severally with bribery, treating, and intimidation and undue influence, before, during, and after the said Election.

In the particulars of the bribery alleged and charged against the Respondents, no less than 80 cases of bribery were specifically mentioned.

On the day before the trial, the Respondent Thomas Robinson, by a notice under his hand, signified his intention not to oppose the Petition.

At the trial, the Respondent Thomas Robinson did not appear either in person or by Counsel or otherwise to oppose the Petition. The Respondent Charles James Monk did appear by Counsel. The evidence of Joseph Stoddart and John Clement Morris (Shorthand Notes of which accompany our Report) was abundantly sufficient to satisfy us that bribery had been committed by John Clement Morris, an Agent of the said Thomas Robinson, that he had bribed Joseph Stoddart, Thomas Meadows, and a third man, whose name was unknown, to vote.

Stoddart was the first Witness examined, and it will be seen that in his evidence he stated that he was asked by Morris to vote for Monk and Robinson.

This Witness was allowed to leave the box unquestioned by Mr. Monk's Counsel. It is due to Mr. Monk to say that Morris, who was afterwards called, denied that he had mentioned Mr. Monk's name, but this was after Stoddart had left the box.

No other evidence was offered with respect to any one of the other cases mentioned in the particulars, and there was no attempt made to establish any one of the charges made against Mr. Monk or his Agents.

We have no reason to suppose that in delivering the particulars the Petitioners acted otherwise than under a belief that they would be in a condition to affect both the seats.

Before the trial we believe that the charges of personal bribery against Mr. Monk were abandoned, but no application was made to withdraw the charges of corrupt practices through his alleged agents, and his Counsel appeared in Court as though those charges were to be persisted in.

No explanation was offered to us as to the reasons why no attempt even to prove those charges was made, notwithstanding they had never been withdrawn.

And no observation was addressed to us by Mr. Monk's Counsel, which indicated to our minds that he was surprised at the course adopted, and at the sudden abandonment of the Petition so far as it affected Mr. Monk.

Moreover, after our judgment was given declaring Mr. Monk to have been duly elected, Mr. Monk's Counsel made no application for his costs, which we were prepared to award him had he asked for them, as we intimated to him; but he declined to make any application upon the subject.

Under these circumstances we are not satisfied that the abandonment of the case against Mr. Monk was not the result of an arrangement made with the view of withholding from us the evidence of the extensive corrupt practices which there is reason to believe had taken place at the Election.

Given under our hands, this 15th day of June 1880.

C. E. POLLOCK.
H. HAWKINS.

To the Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

And the said Report, together with the said Certificates and Reports, were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—OUT-DOOR RELIEF (IRELAND).

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the terms of the Local Government Board Circular of the 1st June 1880, requiring, as a condition for the receipt of out-door relief by the able-bodied, that each person shall do eight hours labour; and, whether he will modify the above conditions and assimilate them to those in force in England, by leaving it to the discretion of the guardians to require the labour test?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have seen the Circular referred to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, and I must say that the Order now in force is similar to one issued during the famine of 1846. The hon. Member is not altogether correct in thinking that there is no discretion in the hands of Boards of Guardians, the words "so far as practicable," qualifying the condition. I fear the labour test is necessary.

LOWER THAMES VALLEY—MAIN SEWAGE BOARD.

MR. CUBITT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has arrived at any decision respecting the sewage scheme of the Lower Thames Valley Main Sewage Board; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the official Reports of the inspectors upon it?

MR. DODSON: The Department has recently received the Report of the Inspector, which has been referred back to him for some further information. The matter will receive my attention as early as practicable; but the question is one of unusual importance and involving interests of great magnitude, and it cannot be disposed of without the most careful consideration. When a decision has been arrived at I will see whether the Report can be laid on the Table; but it is not usual to do so, as these Reports are intended for the guidance of the Board only. If the Report is laid on the Table, a similar course must be adopted with the Evidence, which extended over more than 40 days.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT—EXAMINATIONS AND REWARDS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has observed the fact disclosed in the published accounts of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland for the period from October 1878 to December 1879, that it has cost £11,227 in expense of administration to distribute £11,987 in exhibitions, prizes, and fees, and that a balance of £9,987 of the income for the period has been left unused by the Board; and, whether steps will be taken to secure a better administration than that which applies but one-third of the income for the purposes contemplated by this Statute, whilst another third is absorbed in the cost of administration, and the remaining third is not employed at all?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have seen the accounts to which the hon. Member refers. I would remind him that the Intermediate Education Act has two objects—namely, the carrying out of the system of public examinations and the distribution of the rewards. One half the expense of administration is connected with the cost of examinations, an essential duty of the Board. Much of the other half of the expense of administration arises from expenses necessary in first starting the Act. As regards the fact that one-third of the income has not been employed within the time with which the Report deals, that also arises from the Act having only so recently come into operation; but so great is the increase in the number of candidates that I fear this year the difficulty will be to bring the expenses within the income of the fund allocated.

BARONIAL SESSIONS (IRELAND)— PRESENTMENTS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the extraordinary presentment session for the barony of Tireragh, county of Sligo, passed in March last 69 presentments, amounting to £2,683; that £1,004 of the outlay so proposed was approved of by the Board of Works; and that, nevertheless, last month the baronial session dissolved itself, having arranged for but one contract of £130, and having allowed all the other presentments to become void, including one in respect of a boundary wall to a road beside the river at Ballina, which road the Grand Jury have left in a condition that is dangerous to the safety of life; whether the presentment session was bound to make arrangements for carrying out the presentments approved of by the Board of Works; and, whether steps will be taken to have these presentments executed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, at the baronial session referred to by the hon. Member 19 (not 69) presentments were made, amounting to £2,683, of which sum £1,004 was approved of. When notifying the approval to the secretary of the Grand Jury, the Board of Works directed that steps should be at once taken to have the works executed. I am not aware of the action by the baronial session which is stated by the hon. Member to have taken place; but I have directed immediate inquiry to be made, and if I find intervention desirable I will take such steps as I may find necessary.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS' RESIDENCE ACT.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether steps will be taken to enable managers of National Schools to avail themselves of the National School Teachers' Residence Act, passed in 1875 and amended in 1879, by affording them facilities for borrowing money to erect residences in places where there are none?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have inquired into this subject, and find that considerable facilities already exist for managers of National Schools to borrow money to erect residences for teachers. The Commissioners of National Education are anxious that these facilities should be availed of; but they inform me they have no control in the matter over the managers, and though some managers find a difficulty in procuring free sites for their residences, the main cause of the difficulty arises from the non-action of the managers themselves. The Commissioners, in their last Report, say—

“ We have to express our regret and disappointment at the apathy exhibited by the managers of National Schools in not availing themselves of the facilities afforded by this measure for providing suitable dwellings for teachers.”

WAYS AND MEANS—THE RESOLUTIONS—STOCKS OF DUTY-PAID WINES.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to follow the principle, adopted in the instance of wines in 1860, as well as with other articles of commerce at different periods, and allow to wholesale dealers a drawback equivalent to the reduction now proposed, on any stocks of Duty paid wines they may have on hand at the time when the new scale of Duties comes into operation?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend what I have to say is this. It is true that in the case of wines of 1860, and in regard to other articles of commerce at different periods, allowance has been made to wholesale dealers on the occasion of reductions of duty; but it is true with very great limitations indeed. In fact, it may almost be said that the system of drawback or allowance on duty-paid stocks of articles imported from abroad has for a great length of time been practically extinct. A certain amount of allowance was made in 1860 in regard to wines; but the reduction made on the duty of wines at that period was a large and heavy one, amounting to more than 60 per cent where the duty was lowest, and to between 80 and 90 per cent where it was highest. I, therefore, am not prepared to give any pledge at the present time whether any reduction will be made. Any reduction that may be made will be in a very limited amount in proportion to a small percentage of the value of the article. All I can say is, that it would be well if those interested in the matter would be good enough to lay before me all they can in the way of precedent and argument for and against these allowances or drawbacks on articles of this kind, and I can assure them the information will receive my most careful consideration. The matter will be open to discussion in this House when we come to deal with the Resolutions.

POST OFFICE (MAIL CONTRACTS)—THE 'ORIENT AND THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COMPANIES.

MR. BAXTER asked the Postmaster General, What has been the annual loss between the 31st March 1876 and the 31st of March 1879, under the Postal Contract of 1st August 1874, on carrying the India, China, and Australian Mails; what would be the estimated annual loss on that Contract were the postage reduced to the Postal Union rate of 2½d., in compliance with the wishes of various public bodies and meetings in India; and, if his attention has been called to the fact that the Peninsular and Oriental Contract speed to Australia is 10½ to 11 knots, whereas the average speed of the steamers of the unsubsidised Orient Company is 14 to 15 knots, and that, although upwards of 1,000 miles are added to the distance traversed by the latter in consequence of their going out round the Cape, the average length of their passages in 1880 has been only forty days, whereas that of the Peninsular and Oriental vessels during the same period has been forty-eight days?

MR. FAWCETT: The annual loss to the revenues of the United Kingdom on the contract for the mails to India, China, and Australia was, in 1876, £216,000; in 1877-8, £239,000; and the estimated loss on the year 1878-9 is £246,000. The estimate of the loss which would have been incurred if the postage had been reduced to half the amount would be about £28,000 in addition to the loss actually incurred. With regard to the other Question, it is correct to state that the contract speed of the Peninsular and Oriental Company in carrying the mails to India, China, and Australia is about 11 knots an hour. I am by no means answerable for this contract, which was entered into before the present Government came into Office, and I voted against it. The average time taken by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers between London and Melbourne via Brindisi in the transmission of mails is not, as my right hon. Friend says, 48 days, but the contract period is 39½ days, and that time, I believe, has been in only one instance exceeded. It is true that the average rate of passage in the vessels of the unsubsidised Orient Company is considerably faster than that of the subsidized line of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. The average rate of speed of the former is between 14 and 15 knots an hour, and from information sent to the Post Office I believe the length of the passage from Plymouth to Adelaide, the first port at which they stop, is a few hours under 40 days. In one instance the passage was completed in 35 days. By the Peninsular and Oriental Line the mails from London to Adelaide are delivered in 37 days on the average.

BRITISH SUGAR REFINERS—THE FRENCH DUTIES.

MR. MACLIVER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the French Government, in the course of the present negotiations for the reduction of the Wine Duties, has agreed to meet the complaints of British sugar refiners; and if the proposal now before the French House of Assembly for reducing (in October next) the fiscal Duty on sugar in France from 70 to 40 francs per 100 kilos, is the one which is to be substituted for the present system?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, formal negotiations between the two Governments can hardly be said to have commenced. The proposal now before the French

House Assembly for reducing in October the fiscal duty on sugar in France was made by the French Government on its own responsibility, and without any previous communication with us. We have to judge it upon its merits and see what becomes of it. There is no engagement bearing upon it in any way. The material object of the Question of my hon. Friend I suppose is to obtain an assurance that the subject will be borne in mind when negotiations come on between the British and French Governments, and that assurance I can freely give him.

STIPENDARY MAGISTRATES (IRELAND).

MR. WARTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in consequence of the defeat sustained by them on Friday night, to issue the Returns relating to Stipendary Magistrates in Ireland which they considered should not be issued, due regard being had to the interests of the public; if not, whether it is their intention to take immediate steps to ask the House to rescind the vote?

MR. SEXTON, as the Mover of the Returns in question, asked whether it was not unprecedented to bring such a Question before the House?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I only saw this Question five minutes ago. Not having been addressed to me, it escaped my notice, and I have not had time to communicate with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It is not the intention of the Government to ask the House to rescind the vote. It was one of those Returns that are put down thinking they are unopposed, and it is usual to give Notice to the Department concerned that they will be pressed if they cannot be so given. I had told the hon. Gentleman two or three days before to be good enough to confer with me. Part of the Return I was willing to give; another part was unnecessary. There is no real objection to the Return, except that it gives very great trouble to the Office. If I had thought the Return would have been seriously pressed on Saturday morning, I should have remained here instead of going to bed. As it is now, I think it better to let the matter stand as it is.

Mr. Gladstone

NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD EXTENSION.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to a statement contained in the "Echo" of June 11th, that—

"On the completion of the works for the extension of the Chatham Dockyard, upon which about 1,500 convicts are employed, Chatham will cease to be a penal station, as the convicts will be removed to other places and the prison will be converted into a Naval barrack. The officers and men of the Naval Reserve will be transferred from Sheerness to Chatham ;"

and, whether such statement is correct?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is true that the work on the extension of Chatham Dockyard will be nearly complete in about a year's time, and there will then be no further employment for the convicts. It will then be for the consideration of the Home Office whether to maintain the convict prison there; but I have heard of no proposal to convert the prison into a barrack for officers and seamen, in lieu of the naval barracks at Sheerness, and there is no such intention.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — LEGISLATION.

MR. DODDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce during the present Session of Parliament any measure for the consolidation and amendment of the Laws relating to Municipal Corporations?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am afraid my answer must be that, in the present state of Public Business, I see no prospect of being able to introduce such a measure.

ARMY—PROPOSED VOLUNTEER REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, inasmuch as Government have refused to sanction a Review of Volunteers in Hyde Park, because public order would be endangered, and the trees, flowers, and shrubberies injured by the crowd that would be assembled on such an occasion, and also on account of the interruption to street traffic, it is to be understood that for the future no Reviews of the regular troops, or militia, nor any political demonstrations are to be held in Hyde Park; and, what was the amount of injury, in money value, done to the flowers and shrubberies on the occasion of the last Volunteer Hyde Park Review?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my noble Friend, I must remind him and the House that, as Secretary of State for War, I have nothing to do with the general regulations for the use of Hyde Park, and I am not aware that it is intended under the Statute to make any change in those regulations. So far as the use of the Park for Reviews is concerned, no general decision has been adopted by the War Department, but each case will stand on its own merits. The proposals for the great Volunteer Review were brought before us by a committee of officers, who stated that 45,000 men would be assembled; and Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that, considering the enormous crowds which would probably be collected to witness a Review on such a scale, it ought not to be held in Hyde Park. As to the second Question of my noble Friend, I can only say that I have not charge of the Park, and therefore it is not in my power to say what was the extent of the money value of the injury done on the occasion of the last Volunteer Review.

THE CENSUS BILL.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the President of the Local Government Board, When he hopes to be able to introduce a Bill for taking the Census in 1881?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, it was his intention to introduce the Bill as soon as the progress of the Business afforded a prospect of the House being able to practically deal with it.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (PATRONAGE, &c.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state to the House what offices in Ireland are in his patronage, and the statutes or other authority by virtue of which such patronage is vested in him; whether, in addition to such patronage (if any), there has, under the arrangements of the Irish department of the present Government, been also vested in him, in whole or part, the patronage which by statute or the Queen's Patent rightfully belongs to the Lord Lieutenant; and, whether, with a view of giving the House information on the subject, he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of Her Majesty's Letters Patent under the Great Seal, appointing Earl Cowper, K.G., Lord Lieutenant General and Governor General of Ireland; and also a Copy of the Warrant, Letter, or other Document whereby the Chief Secretary was appointed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, in order fully to answer the Question of the noble Lord, I should have to detain the House with a somewhat long speech; and I cannot but think the matters referred to would be more fitting for a Motion than a Question. If the noble Lord brings on a discussion about them I shall be ready to take part in it. I doubt there being much practical advantage in such discussion; but that I must leave to the discretion of the noble Lord. Meantime, if he will put in the form of a Return the information he desires, I will tell him whether I am able to give it to him. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to add that I know of nothing novel in the relations or arrangements between my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant and myself, either as regards patronage or anything else.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I beg to give Notice that I will call attention to this matter at an early opportunity, and as soon as possible after the publication of the documents to which the right hon. Gentleman refers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I shall wait for the noble Lord to move for those documents, and for him to say what documents he wishes laid on the Table. I did not issue any invitation to him to move for those Papers.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Then, does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to grant the documents?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: If the noble Lord will put that and other matters in the form of a Return, I will be happy to consider the question.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — CIRCULAR OF "THE LIBERAL CENTRAL OFFICE."

MR. GORST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whe-

House Assembly for reducing in October the fiscal duty on sugar in France was made by the French Government on its own responsibility, and without any previous communication with us. We have to judge it upon its merits and see what becomes of it. There is no engagement bearing upon it in any way. The material object of the Question of my hon. NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD EXTENSION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am afraid my answer must be that, in the present state of Public Business, I see no prospect of being able to introduce such a measure.

ARMY — PROPOSED VOLUNTEER REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, inasmuch as Government have refused to sanction a Review of Volunteers in Hyde Park, because public order would be endangered, and the trees, flowers, and shrubberies injured by the crowd that would be assembled on such an occasion, and also on account of the interruption to street traffic, it is to be understood that for the future no Reviews of the regular troops, or militia, nor any replaced by a light steel mast. Otherwise, the vessel was ready to proceed to the Mediterranean.

HARES AND RABBITS BILL—THE VALUATION ACT.

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of the Hares and Rabbits Bill becoming Law and so depriving the landlord of the exclusive right of sporting, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to modify or repeal the sixth section of the Act of Victoria, 37 and 38, entitled—whereby the landlord pays the whole of the rate to the poor in respect of such sporting rights?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As far as I understand the matter, it will certainly not be right to repeal or modify this Statute. The hon. Member and myself read the Act in totally different ways. In the 6th clause of the Statute the law assumes that the whole of the game belongs to the tenant, and the consequence is that the tenant is rated in respect to the game; but he may recover that rate from the landlord if the latter reserves the game. If the Hares and Rabbits Bill passes into law and the tenant claims a portion of the game, of course he will not be able to recover from the landlord in respect of such portion. Therefore, the law will remain exactly as it is now. In a sub-section of Clause 6 it is provided that where the right of sporting is severed from the occupation of the land, either the owner or the lessee may be rated as the occupier thereof. Therefore, the landlord will be rated only in respect of that portion of sporting rights which he enjoys. These being the circumstances of the case, I think no modification of the Statute cited will be required; but, of course, if it be found that any alteration is wanted, the attention of the Government will be turned to it.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 24—EUROPEAN CONFERENCE.

MR. A. BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it be true, as is commonly reported, that a Conference of the Representatives of the European Powers is about to meet at Berlin; and, if so, whether he can tell the House with what matters it is proposed that the Conference should deal; and, whether the Government intend to lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to this subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government, in common with the other Powers whose mediation is contemplated in the 24th Article of the Treaty of Berlin, have received an invitation from the German Government to take part in a Conference which is to meet at Berlin to-morrow in order to consider the question of the Greek Frontier, and Her Majesty's Government have accepted this invitation. They will be represented by Lord Odo Russell, who will be assisted by Sir Lintorn Simmons. Papers on the subject will be laid before Parliament very shortly.

SPAIN—COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of a reduction in the Duty upon Spanish Wines, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to insist that Spain shall withdraw her differential Duties in such manner that British and Irish vessels may be placed on the same footing as Spanish ships, and may be enabled to land manufactured goods in Spanish ports without being met by a system of taxation which is practically prohibitory? The hon. Member also asked, Whether, in the event of a reduction in the Duty upon French Wines, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to insist that France shall make a corresponding reduction in the Duties which are at present levied upon British and Irish manufactures; or if it is intended that France shall continue to tax largely the whole of our manufactures, while we are to admit all hers (except wines) absolutely Duty free?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The matters to which the hon. Member alludes will be carefully considered in the course of the commercial negotiations which Her Majesty's Government hope they may shortly be able to commence with Spain. Her Majesty's Government trust that the result of these negotiations will be to effect a substantial improvement in the commercial relations of the two countries; but it must be obvious to the hon. Member that it would be quite impossible to make any announcement at present with regard to the particular points on which Her Majesty's Government will insist, or the particular objects which they have in view. The answer which I have already given with regard to the Spanish negotiations will apply equally to the hon. Member's Question about France.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) asked me late last evening what course Her Majesty's Government intended to take with regard to the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). I promised to answer the Question next Thursday, but it may be to the convenience of the House that I should at once state that we cannot assent to its second reading; but that, in consequence of the distress prevailing in some parts of Ireland, we shall think it right to ask Parliament to enlarge for a time—that is, until the end of the year 1881—the discretionary power of the County Court Judge, so that he may, under certain circumstances, give compensation to tenants in certain districts who are ejected for non-payment of rent. For that purpose I shall propose a new clause in the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill now before the House. I shall put this clause on the Table to-night, together with a Schedule of the districts to which it will apply. I may add that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wishes me to take this opportunity of stating that he will forthwith advise Her Majesty to appoint a small Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870.

LORD ELCHO: in consequence of the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, I wish to ask the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), as a Member of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, Whether it is or is not the case that, at the close of the present week, the Members of the Commission intend to proceed to Dublin, for the purpose of making inquiries in regard to the state of the Land Question in Ireland, and whether the matter to which the Chief Secretary has alluded does not form part of the subject which the Commission has to investigate? ["Order, order!"]

MR. RITCHIE said, that as the noble Lord had not given him Notice of the Question, he was not prepared to give to it a definite answer.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out, that it was irregular to put Questions to Members, not being Ministers of the Crown, in relation to Business which was not before the House.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, on the day set apart for the debate on the second reading of my Bill, he will be able to state the objections which the Government entertain to that measure?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Certainly.

LORD ELCHO: I thought I was in Order just now, and I apologise for my interposition. I desire to give Notice that, on Thursday, I will ask the Prime Minister the Question which I put to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

In reply to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOKE,

MR. GLADSTONE said: The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill will be the first Order of the Day on Thursday, and the clause of my right hon. Friend will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow. I wish to say a word with reference to a Question put to me by my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of the Malt Duties. He made an inquiry about the computation of the drawback on stocks of malt on hand on the 30th of September next, and I mentioned the computations which had been made, and the grounds of those computations. But these were, of course, made under a disadvantage, inasmuch as they could not be conveniently founded upon positive and direct inquiry of competent persons in the trade before the production of the proposals of the Government. As we now stand we are in a position to communicate with the trade with greater freedom, and I have thought it better we should endeavour to check and verify those computations by new inquiries. I shall not be able to produce the figures probably till shortly before we proceed to discussion on the Bill, and we shall reserve in the Bill power to make detailed arrangements for the levy of the duty, and to fix the time after which the brewers will be called on to pay the new tax on beer.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked when the Employers' Liability Bill would be proceeded with?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was afraid there was no probability of his being able to fix an early day for the discussion of the measure. Due Notice would, however, be given before it was proceeded with.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON wished to know when the Hares and Rabbits Bill would be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: No day is fixed at present; probably at the beginning of next week.

CO-OPERATIVE STORES—APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

MR. R. POWER asked the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, When he intended to move the re-appointment of the Select Committee on Co-operative Stores?

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL, in reply, said, that as soon as the slight complications which had arisen had been settled, one way or another, he should do his best to get the Committee re-appointed.

M O T I O N S.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868—NEW WRITS.—RESOLUTION.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR moved—

“That where any Election has been declared void, under the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868, and the Judges have reported that any person has been guilty of bribery and corrupt practices, no Motion for the issuing of a New Writ shall be made without two days' previous Notice being given in the Votes, such Notice to be appointed for consideration before the Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion.”

MR. J. R. YORKE said, the subject to which the Motion related was one of considerable interest. He recollected that it was his duty in 1866 to sit as a Member of a Committee of that House on an Inquiry which involved the conduct of the constituency of Galway, when it was unanimously reported that corrupt practices had prevailed at the previous election for that borough. He waited a few days in expectation that a Motion would be made to the effect that a Commission should be issued to inquire into the existence of such practices, and he had then been informed by the Chairman of the Committee, and by Sir George Grey, who was at the time Secretary of State for the Home Department, that they did not intend to take any step of that kind. In spite of the Report of the Committee, no Member thought it his duty to take action; the Report was a nullity, and the constituency went on its way rejoicing to distinguish itself afterwards more than once in a similar manner. Since that time the law against candidates had been made more stringent. The risks to which a candidate was exposed were enough to make him shrink from seeking election. He found an agent chosen for him, and all the machinery of corruption fortified by ancient custom, against which it was impossible for him to contend. If the law was to be stringently enforced against anyone, it ought not to be against the unfortunate candidate, but rather against those who maintained these customs. If a candidate was guilty of personal bribery, he was liable to be indicted for misdemeanour and to be punished by imprisonment; he was disqualified for voting at any Parliamentary or municipal election; he was debarred from holding any municipal or judicial office; and he was to be removed from the Commission of the Peace. In the case of Launceston, a Member had just been unseated for having, in a moment of impatience at the complaints made to him about the ravages of rabbits, practically said—“Oh, bother the rabbits. Do what you like with them.” The Judges held that the law held a candidate responsible for illegal acts which he had directly forbidden.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was travelling far beyond the question.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he was endeavouring to show the hardship with which the law pressed upon the candidate as compared with the constituency. Liberal Members were now falling, and the House would soon have before it the question of the issue of Writs; and it was better that they should determine beforehand the principles by which they were to be guided.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was travelling beyond the scope of the Resolution, which was strictly limited to the time which should elapse before the House ordered the issue of a New Writ.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he should not pursue the subject, but would conclude with a Motion that instead of the words "two days" they should insert the words "one fortnight."

Amendment proposed, in line 4, to leave out the word "two" and insert the word "fourteen,"—(Mr. J. R. Yorke,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Question."

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Motion was not that the Writ should issue after two days' Notice, but that it should not issue until after two days' Notice. The object was simply to allow of sufficient time for Members to consider whether any case was one in which further delay ought to be asked for. The Resolution did not apply to cases in which it had been reported that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, as these cases were distinctly provided for by the Act. If in other cases there was no reason for further delay, it would be unjust to the constituencies that such delay should occur, and two days were enough to enable Members to consider whether it was necessary to inflict a penalty on the whole constituency. It appeared from Sir Erskine May's work on The Law and Practice of Parliament, that at one period, in 1853 and 1854, it was ordered that no such Motion should be made without seven days' previous Notice in the Votes. The House appeared to have thought, however, that this was rather hard on a constituency unless a more positive presumption of mischief prevailed; for in succeeding Sessions until 1860, and again in 1866, 1874, and 1875, it was ordered that no such Motion should be made without two days' previous Notice being given. He did not think it mattered much whether it was a question of two or three days; but he believed he was supported by the experience of the House when he said that 14 days was too long a time, considering that, in the great majority of cases, there would be no ground whatever for preventing the issue of the Writ. Therefore, he must oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put.

Ordered, That where any Election has been declared void, under the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868, and the Judges have reported that any person has been guilty of bribery and corrupt practices, no Motion for the issuing of a New Writ shall be made without two days' previous Notice being given in the Votes, such Notice to be appointed for consideration before the Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion.

EUROPEAN ARMAMENTS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. RICHARD, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with other Powers, with a view to bring about a mutual and simultaneous reduction of European Armaments;"

said: I must cast myself on the kind indulgence of the House while I attempt to bring under its attention a subject which all will admit to be one of great importance, and which—as no one feels more deeply than I do—is also one of great difficulty. But while I am oppressed with a sense of the onerous nature of the task I have undertaken, there is some satisfaction in the thought that I am free at least from one kind of embarrassment which sometimes attends discussions in this House, because the question with which I have to deal is one that stands quite apart from all considerations of Party. It is not a question of Party; it is a question of humanity; and certainly nothing shall fall from my lips that will be calculated to provoke the spirit of Party. I recall with pleasure at this moment, that when I brought forward a Motion on International Arbitration in this House, in 1873, a considerable number of Gentlemen on the Conservative side did me the honour to vote in favour of my proposal, and there is no Party reason whatever why they should not support the Resolution which I am now about to submit to the House. There is one other preliminary remark which I wish to make. I am very anxious that this Motion should be judged on its own merits, apart from any reference to the supposed opinions of the Proposer, or of any class of persons who are thought to take a special interest in it. I believe I lie under the suspicion of belonging to what is called "the Peace-at-any-price Party." What that means, I confess I do not know, except that it is one of those vague terms of reproach with which it is found convenient to smite a political adversary when nothing more precise and pertinent is available for the purpose. Whatever may be my views on certain abstract questions, I hope I have the courage of my convictions, and that I shall be prepared to avow and defend them with such ability as I possess on all fitting occasions. But, on the present occasion, extreme views of that kind are not brought in question at all. I promise the House that I shall not proclaim any dangerously pacific views, and that I shall not ask the House to assent to anything which the most devout believer in the right of war may not consistently support. There is one point I presume on which we are all agreed—namely, that the present armed condition of Europe, the rampant militaryism which pervades and overshadows the nations has grown to such enormous dimensions that it is scarcely possible to use exaggerated language with respect to it. We all feel that this state of things is an affront to reason, a scandal to civilization, a scourge upon humanity, and, above all, that it is a reproach to that holy religion which the nations of Christendom profess to accept and reverence. It seems to me most humiliating when we consider the fact that all the nations of Europe, with one exception, have been for more than 1,000 years professedly subject to the influences of Christian civilization, to the power of that religion which is pre-eminently the religion of peace, and yet at this moment by far the larger proportion of the resources of all these nations is devoted to the construction of weapons of destruction, and to the training and disciplining of millions of men to the adroit use of those weapons for the purpose of mutual slaughter and devastation. There is a celebrated catechism, which, I believe, is still much in use in Scotland; the first question in it is—"What is the chief end of man?"

I have sometimes thought that if any celestial visitor were to come to our world, and were to cast his eye on the state of things which now actually exists in Europe, his answer to that question would be, that the chief end of man must be to fight and to prepare for fighting. It is not easy to say when this insane system of rivalry in armaments during peace came into vogue in Europe. Montesquieu spoke of it 130 years ago as "a new disease" which was spreading through Europe—

"For as soon," he says, "as one State augments its troops, the others forthwith augment theirs, so that they gain nothing by it but a common ruin."

Things were not always so. Vattel tells us that, in the 17th century, when a war was concluded—

"They seldom failed to stipulate in Treaties of Peace that both parties should disband their troops; and why," he asked, "is not this salutary custom continued?"

So far is that from being the case now, that every fresh peace, as it is called—though it may be more fitly termed an armed truce—instead of affording relief to the nations by the diminution of their burdens, becomes a starting-point for new and enormous augmentations of their military forces. Béranger, the celebrated French lyrist, in describing the cost of war, says—

"L'ogre a diné, payez la carte;"

and Bastiat, the distinguished writer on Political Economy, thereupon remarks that the ogre now costs as much for his digestion as for his meals. One thing is certain—that the Russian War, among the many other evils which we owe to it, gave an immense impulse to this process. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Northcote), in a very able work which he published about 17 years ago, entitled Twenty Years of Financial Policy, remarks pointedly on this effect of the Russian War. He said he was not going to inquire whether that war was worth what it cost to mankind at large, or to England in particular—

"But," he adds, "there can be no doubt that among its results have been these two—that it stirred up in Europe a spirit of restlessness, and set all the world to seek for the means of improving the instruments of attack and defence; and to add enormously and without stint or measure to the most unprofitable and unsatisfactory of all possible forms of expenditure."

After every succeeding war the same race of mutual folly and ruin has been renewed with increasing celerity, so that the armed forces of Europe have been growing with so much rapidity as to be almost incredible. An article in the last volume yet published of the new edition of The Encyclopædia Britannica, under the word "Europe," contains certain statements, founded on elaborate statistical calculations, which go to show that between the years 1859 and 1874—that is, in the course of 15 years—there have been added to the armed forces of Europe nearly 2,000,000 men. It is not easy to give with accuracy the statistics of European armaments, because they are continually changing, and always changing, I may add, in the direction of increase. Lord Derby stated not long ago his belief that there were 10,000,000 men trained to arms in all ways in Europe, and The Times newspaper, at the same time, or shortly afterwards, spoke of 12,000,000 men. Of course, under this estimate all the Reserves are taken into account—the Militia, the Volunteers, the Landwehr, the Landsturm, the territorial army of France, and so on. But I believe it will be no exaggeration to say that at any one moment you may find 4,000,000 men under arms in Europe. This, of course, must entail an enormous cost on the various countries. I have seen many calculations of the amount, and one, by a French gentleman of great reputation, which makes the total estimated cost as much as £500,000,000 a-year. Now, there are three items into which that sum may be divided; first, the money actually extracted from the pockets of the people by the Naval and Military Budgets, which may be put down at £160,000,000 a-year; but that is the smallest part of the matter, and a far more important item is the loss to society by the withdrawal of so many millions of able-bodied men from industrial pursuits. We must remember, of course, that, though it is not his own fault, a soldier merely consumes, and is in no way a producer. I have mentioned two items of the monstrous amount, and now have to add to them the interest of the prodigious sums laid out on instruments and munitions of war of all sorts, ships of war, fortifications, arms, ammunition, accoutrements, and so on; and which, it must be borne in mind, are absolutely unproductive. I ask the House to consider what might be done if only half of this great sum could be economized, if only part of the broad stream of wealth that is yearly carried down the bottomless abyss of military expenditure could be directed to irrigate and fructify the waste places of humanity; how much might be done to relieve the misery, to elevate the character of the people, to provide better dwellings for the poor, to furnish them with productive occupation, to spread the blessings of education among the ignorant and degraded, and generally to improve the material and moral condition of the great masses, whom God, I contend, has given in charge to the civilized and Christian Governments of Europe. Unhappily, also, the expenditure on these armaments is growing with appalling rapidity. In The Times newspaper, about the beginning of the year, there was a remarkable article, founded on a calculation by a German statistician, which showed that the annual public expenditure of Europe has risen in 14 years, between 1865 and 1879, from £398,000,000 to £585,000,000. For Russia and Germany, expenditure has more than doubled itself in that period. But, large as these amounts are, they do not satisfy the demands of the Governments, and, in addition, the future is mortgaged to supply the needs of the present. National Debts have grown, in the same period, from £2,626,000,000 to £4,324,000,000, the cause being war and warlike armaments. In the year 1865, Germany spent £10,000,000 on her Army and Navy; now she spends £21,000,000. At the former date Russia spent £22,000,000, and now spends £36,000,000; and a similar increase is noticeable in the case of the other European Powers. Remarking on these astounding figures, The Economist says—

"The total increase of expenditure caused by wars and the apprehension of wars has, if we take the average interest at 4 per cent, been £131,000,000 a-year, or considerably more than the taxation of either of the two richest countries in Europe, England and France. The amount at 4 per cent represents a capital of £3,200,000,000, which, as long as that expenditure continues, and much of it is perpetual, is lost to the industrial work of Europe, and, consequently, to the progress of civilization and to the material well-being of the people."

This expenditure is still going on, and, on the principle which seems to be accepted by European statesmen—that civilized nations can exist, side by side, in no other attitude than that of armed and mutual menace, it seems likely that it must continue. If it be true that all European nations are only organized gangs of robbers, constantly watching for opportunities to attack and plunder each other, it is evident that when one of them adds to its means of offence, the others must follow its example, and there can be no limit to the process, so far as I can see, until all the men and all the means of all the nations are absorbed in their military preparations. And we really seem as though we were approximating this consummation. Already in most countries by far the largest portion of their revenues are swallowed up in warlike expenditure, in paying for the interest of debts contracted by past wars, and in making preparations for future wars. And in some of the largest States of Europe—in France, in Germany, and, I believe, now in Russia—all able-bodied men, with inconsiderable exceptions, are liable to military service. There are only two classes of the population exempt from it—namely, the women and the clergy. And who can tell whether, in the mad rivalry still going on, the time may not come when the Governments will lay their hands on the daughters and pastors of the people? So that, instead of the “sweet girl-graduates,” of which the Poet Laureate speaks, we may have fierce girl-captains and colonels. In Italy, and, I believe, in Germany, already some classes of the clergy are subject to military service. This is, no doubt, deplorable enough, so long at least as ministers of religion act consistently as servants of the Prince of Peace. But when the clergy, of whatever church or sect, are prompt to “beat the drum ecclesiastic,” and to use the pulpit as an instrument to inflame warlike passion, it is difficult to see why they should be exempt from sharing the hardships and sufferings into which they help by their exhortations to plunge others. Now, what is the practical result? Do nations after all enjoy rest and quiet and a sense of security? That is the pretext constantly alleged in defence of these armaments. There is a musty old Latin proverb which is quoted usque ad nauseam. It is this—Si vis pacem, para bellum. This is flung at us in a tone so peremptory and off-hand, as though it afforded “confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ” in justification of large armies. Indeed, I am not sure whether there are not some people who think that it is a verse from the Bible. But a more absurd axiom, one more at variance with common sense, and the common experience of mankind, has never been propounded. They fill all Europe with warlike materials; they train millions of men to the use of arms; they inspire them with warlike passions by appeals to patriotism and love of military glory; they nourish in their hearts—as they are bound to do as a justification of their own existence—feelings of jealousy and suspicion towards their neighbours, until they “stand like greyhounds in the slips straining upon the start,” and then they tell us that all this is done as a security for peace. Let them bring their axiom to the test of experience and historical fact. Never since the world began have there been such enormous preparations for war as there have been in Europe during the last 25 years. But have these preparations for war preserved peace? So far otherwise, that during that period there have been six desolating and sanguinary wars in Europe, in the course of which it is estimated that 2,000,000 of human lives have been sacrificed, and £3,000,000,000. I contend, on the contrary, that these great armaments, so far from being preservatives of peace, are provocatives of war. The existence of such huge masses of armed men ready to be launched forth at any moment at the pleasure of some ambitious Monarch or unscrupulous Minister—for the people have no voice in the making of wars—are a perpetual peril to the peace of nations. I think, therefore, one of our own poets has given wise and sound counsel, when he said—

To extort their truncheons from the puny hands
Of heroes, whose infirm and baby minds
Are gratified with mischief, and who spoil,
Because men suffer it, their toy, the world.”

What is the true effect of this state of things? One result is that the finances of many, I might say of most, the great States of Europe are in a chronic condition of embarrassment or deficit. Look at Austria. Mr. Martin, in his Statesman's Manual, states that in eight years—between 1870 and 1877—

her accumulated deficit amounted to £33,000,000. In France the same thing was going on even before the tremendous catastrophe of the war with Germany. From 1848 to 1869 her accumulated deficits amounted to £100,000,000. It is difficult to know what is the financial condition of Russia, as no authentic statements are published. But we may be very certain that her finances are in, at least, quite as unsatisfactory a condition as that of any European nation, and we know that her Debt has increased from £208,000,000 in 1865 to £600,000,000 in 1879. And even Germany, in spite of the enormous indemnity she received from France, and with no Debt to speak of, has found her expenditure constantly on the increase, while her revenue has been as steadily diminishing. In 1873 her expenditure, as stated in the Imperial Budget, was 340,000,000 of marks, and in 1878 it was 540,000,000 of marks; or, an increase in the course of five years, of 200,000,000 of marks, or £16,000,000. In consequence, Prince Bismarck has been compelled to impose heavy protective duties, which have very seriously interfered with and damaged the commerce of his own and other countries. Lord Salisbury, speaking at the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, called attention to the heavy protective duties imposed on British goods by some of the Continental Governments, and said—

“The real cause of this increase of protective duties is the establishment of those gigantic military forces which are increasing every year in every one of the larger countries of this hemisphere, which constitute a permanent drain on the forces of industry, a permanent danger to the interests of commerce, and which impose upon the Governments which feel themselves bound—and if one Government does it all Governments have to do it—in order to maintain these forces, the necessity of finding money in some way that shall not too heavily gall the interests and susceptibilities of their people. Indirect taxation, it is well known, is more readily paid than direct taxation, because its amount is not so easily recognized; and it is the necessity of finding the sustenance of those vast armaments that forces Governments to have recourse to indirect taxation, and they naturally avail themselves of the political support which is to be obtained from those trades that wish for protection in order to carry their policy into effect.”

Look, again, at Italy, that young nationality to which the sympathy of all is drawn so strongly. That country is staggering under the weight of a crushing taxation in order to maintain vast and useless armaments. The annual deficits of Italy since 1860 have been so large, varying from £1,743,000 to £24,680,000, that the public debt, which in 1860 stood at £97,480,000, had increased to £400,000,000 in 1876. Well, what is the effect upon the condition of the people? The effect is, that in all the countries of Europe there are multitudes of people—thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands—sunk in poverty, misery, and ignorance. In the language of one of our own poets—

“The racked inhabitants repine, complain,
Taxed till the brow of labour sweats in vain;
War lays a burden on the reeling State,
And peace does nothing to relieve the weight.
Successive loads successive toils impose,
And sighing millions prophesy the close.”

During last winter, I collected a series of extracts from our own and other journals describing the bitter and widespread distress that existed in various parts of Europe. We were told that in Upper Silesia out of a population of 298,000 no fewer than 150,000 “were next door to starvation.” In Hungary, destructive floods had swept away whole villages, and some of the unfortunate inhabitants were found frozen to death in the woods where they had sought shelter. From Cettigne telegrams reported that a sixth part of the population were nearly dying of famine. Miss Irby wrote that in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in the recently-occupied portions of Novi-Bazar, people were dying of want, cold, and hunger. Sir Henry Layard wrote to Lord Salisbury that in Mossul the people were reduced by want to sell their children. In Italy we read of large meetings of working men demanding—not with clamour and menace, but with a really pathetic moderation—that, if the Government wanted them to pay the heavy taxes imposed upon them, they must first find them work by which they could earn bread for themselves and their families. Nearer at home, in Ireland, there has been distress so severe as to approach to famine. And so in most other European countries, especially in those countries where the mania of militarism is pushed to the greatest length. But, in the meanwhile, what are the Governments of this distressed, paralyzed, half-famishing Europe doing? Oh! they are in full and feverish activity, organizing Armies, Navies, and

Reserves; forging rifled cannon, manufacturing Minie rifles and chassepots by the million; building iron-clads and torpedoes; constructing new fortifications; drilling and dragooning the people in martial exercises, and stimulating with lavish rewards the inventors of infernal machines for the destruction of life and property. And thus, the resources of all nations, whether derived from the gifts of Nature or the rewards of industry, instead of being turned to purposes of utility and advantage, are squandered, to use again the words of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the most unsatisfactory and unprofitable of all forms of expenditure. Is it any wonder to find, as we do, that multitudes of people in some European countries are streaming away from their own homes, to seek in foreign lands some rest and relief from this intolerable system of taxation and military servitude? And those who are too poor to emigrate, which is by far the largest number, are driven in sheer desperation into sullen discontent and dangerous conspiracies against the Governments, until Society becomes honeycombed by Socialism, Communism, and Nihilism; while the Governments, instead of removing the causes of these evils, which they dread, seem to have no other resource than to add to the incumbent weight of militarism, which tends only still more to exasperate the angry and mutinous spirit of the people. Now, the question I wish to ask the House to-night is this—Can nothing be done to put some check upon that system? This, of course, is the very knot of the problem with which we have to deal. Of the magnitude of the evil there are no two opinions. All men acknowledge it freely. Even the statesmen who most actively promote it declare, with more or less sincerity, they do so with infinite regret. The more thoughtful among military men, while professing to consider it inevitable, join in the lamentation over such sinister necessity. All our leading statesmen have given their testimony in the same direction, and in powerful and eloquent terms deprecate, deplore, denounce, as preposterous, insane, and ruinous, this system of universal armaments. I have quoted already the words of Lord Salisbury. I could quote equally emphatic words from Lord Derby, from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, when he spoke of "the demon of militarism;" I could quote numberless passages from the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), and a forcible passage from a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). All the journals of the country are constantly denouncing this state of things; but I shall content myself with quoting one sentence from an article which appeared a little time ago in The Times—

"If such a state of things," says The Times, "is permitted to continue, it will be a disgrace to European statesmen; it is upon their shoulders that the real blame will rest."

What, then, are we to do to get rid of this hideous nightmare, which is sitting on the heart of nations and almost suffocating their life? Is what I propose impracticable?—that the different Governments should come to an understanding with a view to the mutual and simultaneous diminution of their armaments. Sir Robert Peel did not think so, when he said—

"Is not the time come when the powerful countries of Europe should reduce those military armaments which they have so sedulously raised? Is not the time come when they should be prepared to declare that there is no use in such overgrown establishments? What is the advantage of one Power greatly increasing its Army and Navy? Does it not see that if it proposes such increase for self protection and defence the other Powers will follow its example? The consequence of this state must be that no increase of relative strength will accrue to any Power; but there must be a universal consumption of the resources of every country in military preparations. . . . The interest of Europe is not that any one Power should exercise a peculiar influence; but the true interest of Europe is to come to some common accord so as to enable every country to reduce those military armaments which belong to a state of war rather than of peace. I do wish that the councils of every country (or that the public voice and mind, if the councils did not) would willingly proclaim that doctrine."

I will now quote the authority of one who will be admitted by Gentlemen opposite to be a great statesman. Lord Beaconsfield, speaking on the 21st of July, 1859, with a special reference to France, said—

"Let us terminate this disastrous system of wild expenditure by mutually agreeing, with no hypocrisy, but in a manner and under circumstances which admit of no doubt, by the reduction of armaments, that peace is really our policy, and then the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) may look forward with no apprehension to his next Budget, and England may then witness the termination of the Income Tax."

Has anything of this kind been done or attempted before? I will not again refer to Vattel's testimony as to what was formerly done in Europe. I will only now allude to the Convention between Great Britain and the United States in 1817, as to the number of armed boats that they would keep on the American Lakes. Nor was that a matter of small moment. The greatest importance was attached to naval supremacy on those Lakes, so much so that the Duke of Wellington thus wrote to Sir George Murray—

"I have told the Ministers repeatedly that a naval superiority on the Lakes is a sine quâ non of success in war on the frontiers of Canada, even if our object be solely defensive, and I hope that when you are there they will take care to secure it for you."

And yet, in the face of this opinion of that great military authority, the two nations had the good sense to enter into this Convention, limiting the number of ships-of-war upon the American Lakes. And what was the result of that? The number of armed boats agreed upon was four or five; but the effect of this limitation was, that the spirit of jealousy and rivalry having been laid asleep, they ceased to have any armed boats at all on those Lakes. In 1851, the year of the Great Exhibition, the late Mr. Cobden brought forward a Motion in this House expressed in much the same language as I have adopted,—proposing a mutual reduction of armaments between England and France. He was answered by Lord Palmerston in a most friendly and complimentary speech, in which he said he adopted both the Motion and the language of the hon. Gentleman. Lord Palmerston said—

"I am glad the hon. Member has taken advantage of this meeting of the world to declare, in his place in Parliament, those principles of universal peace which do honour to him and the country in which they are proclaimed."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 941.]

But while thoroughly approving of the object, he did not like to be fettered and bound in a negotiation. The next movement was made in the memorable proposal of the Emperor of the French, in 1863, to hold an International Congress on the subject. In the speech which he made at the opening of the French Chambers, he shadowed forth his intentions in these words—

"Have not the prejudices and rancours which divided us lasted long enough? Shall the jealous rivalries of the Great Powers unceasingly impede the progress of civilization? Are we still to maintain mutual distrust by exaggerated armaments? Must our most precious resources be indefinitely exhausted in a barren display of our forces?"

Unhappily our Government alone, of all the Governments of Europe, peremptorily refused to entertain this proposal of the Emperor of the French, although the late Lord Derby said that—

"If there was a country in all Europe that had less interest in sending a blank refusal to have anything to do with the Congress it was England."

I hope I shall not appear too egotistical if I refer now for a moment to myself. In 1869 I visited several of the capitals of Europe, including Paris, Brussels, the Hague, Berlin, Munich, Vienna, and Florence, then the capital of the Italian Kingdom, to put myself in communication with members of different Representatives Assemblies in order to see whether we could not promote some concerted action for reduction of armaments in the respective Legislatures. I met many of the leading politicians in these capitals, and found them well disposed to entertain my proposals. Soon after, as the first fruit of my visit, Dr. Virchow proposed in the Prussian Chamber of Deputies the following Resolution:—

"That the Royal Government be requested to use all its influence with a view to reduce within the narrowest practical limits, the expenses of the military administration of the Northern Confederacy, and to seek to bring about by diplomatic negotiations, a general disarmament."

There was a very interesting and animated debate upon the Resolution, and although Dr. Virchow did not succeed, he was sustained by no fewer than 99 votes. Soon after a similar Motion was made in the Chamber of Saxony and carried by a large majority. And, but for the outbreak next year, of the unhappy Franco-German War, this would have been followed up in other Legislatures. Another movement in this direction, of which I do not know much, was made in this country. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) has told me that while he was in the Foreign Office as Under Secretary, about the year 1869, Lord Clarendon originated the movement. Communications were opened with various Crowned Heads and leading statesmen of Europe, with a view to bring about a simultaneous reduction of armaments. I do not know why the matter was broken off; but I suppose the Franco-German War put an end to that also. However, it did great credit to Lord Clarendon to have made the effort. In Austria, Dr. Fischhoff, a very distinguished writer, published some important articles in a leading journal of Vienna, which led to the matter being taken up by a considerable party. The result was that 49 Members of the Austrian Parliament, headed by MM. Fux and Heilsberg, have lately laid upon the Table of the House this Resolution—

“The House of Deputies express a hope that the united Imperial and Royal Government may take into consideration the plan of such a general, proportionate, and simultaneous reduction of armaments, as shall not alter the respective position of the States of Europe; and that the Government will not withhold such efforts as may be necessary for the attainment of this object. The Imperial and Royal Government is also besought to bring this Resolution formally before the Minister for Foreign Affairs.”

The Minister of War himself, in his Report on the Army Bill, joyfully hailed the idea of a simultaneous reduction of the Armies of the various States of Europe, and acknowledged the idea as a practical one, which he was willing to support. It may be said there are difficulties in the way; but no great service was ever accomplished for humanity that had not to encounter difficulties. The triumph of true statesmanship is to overcome difficulties. I cannot see why, if the various States of Europe pursue the process of increasing their armaments on a principal of emulation, if they can add to forces, batteries, ships, guns, fortifications, &c., against each other; why, in the name of common sense, cannot they reverse that process, and begin to undo the mischief they have been doing so long? I cannot but think that the present time is favourable for such overtures as this. We enjoy a lucid interval of peace; and there seems no present danger of a breach of that peace, except from the existence of these enormous armaments. All the people of the earth are groaning under the burdens which these armaments fasten upon them, and they would hail with gladness and gratitude any proposal of this kind, especially coming with the approval of a powerful Government like this. I cannot but think that foreign Governments themselves would rejoice to have such proposals made to them. There are ominous signs abroad among them. When Sovereigns are spending their time in congratulating each other on escaping from assassination, it is surely time that they took some means of removing the dangers which threaten them through driving people into such extremities as these by adding constantly to their armaments. Sir, I venture, in conclusion, to make a very earnest and respectful appeal to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, that he will not turn aside from this great question. The task to which I invite him is not unworthy even of his transcendent abilities. It is not unworthy of his high character, as I estimate it, as the passionate friend of justice and humanity. He has already won many laurels by great deeds of practical statesmanship; and a greater than any of them awaits his hand. No greener wreath ever surrounded any man's brow than that which will encircle his if he will only consent to grapple with this high argument, and endeavour to bring the various nations of Europe into general concert to reduce those armaments. Above all, he will earn the grateful benedictions of millions of the people who are now groaning under this baneful system of militarism. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Motion of which he had given Notice.

MR. W. H. JAMES seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with other Powers, with a view to bring about a mutual and simultaneous reduction of European Armaments.”—(Mr. Richard.)

MR. BAXTER said, he was glad, whatever the issue of this Motion might be, that it had afforded to his hon. Friend (Mr. Richard) an opportunity of delivering one of his terse and telling speeches in favour of the good cause he had so much at heart to a far more sympathetic Parliamentary audience than he had ever addressed before upon the

After every succeeding war the same race of mutual folly and ruin has been renewed with increasing celerity, so that the armed forces of Europe have been growing with so much rapidity as to be almost incredible. An article in the last volume yet published of the new edition of The Encyclopædia Britannica, under the word "Europe," contains certain statements, founded on elaborate statistical calculations, which go to show that between the years 1859 and 1874—that is, in the course of 15 years—there have been added to the armed forces of Europe nearly 2,000,000 men. It is not easy to give with accuracy the statistics of European armaments, because they are continually changing, and always changing, I may add, in the direction of increase. Lord Derby stated not long ago his belief that there were 10,000,000 men trained to arms in all ways in Europe, and The Times newspaper, at the same time, or shortly afterwards, spoke of 12,000,000 men. Of course, under this estimate all the Reserves are taken into account—the Militia, the Volunteers, the Landwehr, the Landsturm, the territorial army of France, and so on. But I believe it will be no exaggeration to say that at any one moment you may find 4,000,000 men under arms in Europe. This, of course, must entail an enormous cost on the various countries. I have seen many calculations of the amount, and one, by a French gentleman of great reputation, which makes the total estimated cost as much as £500,000,000 a-year. Now, there are three items into which that sum may be divided; first, the money actually extracted from the pockets of the people by the Naval and Military Budgets, which may be put down at £160,000,000 a-year; but that is the smallest part of the matter, and a far more important item is the loss to society by the withdrawal of so many millions of able-bodied men from industrial pursuits. We must remember, of course, that, though it is not his own fault, a soldier merely consumes, and is in no way a producer. I have mentioned two items of the monstrous amount, and now have to add to them the interest of the prodigious sums laid out on instruments and munitions of war of all sorts, ships of war, fortifications, arms, ammunition, accoutrements, and so on; and which, it must be borne in mind, are absolutely

unproductive. I ask the House to consider what might be done if only half of this great sum could be economized, if only part of the broad stream of wealth that is yearly carried down the bottomless abyss of military expenditure could be directed to irrigate and fructify the waste places of humanity; how much might be done to relieve the misery, to elevate the character of the people, to provide better dwellings for the poor, to furnish them with productive occupation, to spread the blessings of education among the ignorant and degraded, and generally to improve the material and moral condition of the great masses, whom God, I contend, has given in charge to the civilized and Christian Governments of Europe. Unhappily, also, the expenditure on these armaments is growing with appalling rapidity. In The Times newspaper, about the beginning of the year, there was a remarkable article, founded on a calculation by a German statistician, which showed that the annual public expenditure of Europe has risen in 14 years, between 1865 and 1879, from £398,000,000 to £585,000,000. For Russia and Germany, expenditure has more than doubled itself in that period. But, large as these amounts are, they do not satisfy the demands of the Governments, and, in addition, the future is mortgaged to supply the needs of the present. National Debts have grown, in the same period, from £2,626,000,000 to £4,324,000,000, the cause being war and warlike armaments. In the year 1865, Germany spent £10,000,000 on her Army and Navy; now she spends £21,000,000. At the former date Russia spent £22,000,000, and now spends £36,000,000; and a similar increase is noticeable in the case of the other European Powers. Remarkable on these astounding figures, The Economist says—

"The total increase of expenditure caused by wars and the apprehension of wars has, if we take the average interest at 4 per cent, been £131,000,000 a-year, or considerably more than the taxation of either of the two richest countries in Europe, England and France. The amount at 4 per cent represents a capital of £3,200,000,000, which, as long as that expenditure continues, and much of it is perpetual, is lost to the industrial work of Europe, and, consequently, to the progress of civilization and to the material well-being of the people."

cepted by European statesmen—that civilized nations can exist, side by side, in no other attitude than that of armed and mutual menace, it seems likely that it must continue. If it be true that all European nations are only organized gangs of robbers, constantly watching for opportunities to attack and plunder each other, it is evident that when one of them adds to its means of offence, the others must follow its example, and there can be no limit to the process, so far as I can see, until all the men and all the means of all the nations are absorbed in their military preparations. And we really seem as though we were approximating this consummation. Already in most countries by far the largest portion of their revenues are swallowed up in warlike expenditure, in paying for the interest of debts contracted by past wars, and in making preparations for future wars. And in some of the largest States of Europe—in France, in Germany, and, I believe, now in Russia—all able-bodied men, with inconsiderable exceptions, are liable to military service. There are only two classes of the population exempt from it—namely, the women and the clergy. And who can tell whether, in the mad rivalry still going on, the time may not come when the Governments will lay their hands on the daughters and pastors of the people? So that, instead of the “sweet girl-graduates,” of which the Poet Laureate speaks, we may have fierce girl-captains and colonels. In Italy, and, I believe, in Germany, already some classes of the clergy are subject to military service. This is, no doubt, deplorable enough, so long at least as ministers of religion act consistently as servants of the Prince of Peace. But when the clergy, of whatever church or sect, are prompt to “beat the drum ecclesiastic,” and to use the pulpit as an instrument to inflame warlike passion, it is difficult to see why they should be exempt from sharing the hardships and sufferings into which they help by their exhortations to plunge others. Now, what is the practical result? Do nations after all enjoy rest and quiet and a sense of security? That is the pretext constantly alleged in defence of these armaments. There is a musty old Latin proverb which is quoted usque ad nauseam. It is this—Si vis pacem, para bellum. This is flung at us in a tone so peremptory and off-hand, as though it afforded “confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ” in justification of large armies. Indeed, I am not sure whether there are not some people who think that it is a verse from the Bible. But a more absurd axiom, one more at variance with common sense, and the common experience of mankind, has never been propounded. They fill all Europe with warlike materials; they train millions of men to the use of arms; they inspire them with warlike passions by appeals to patriotism and love of military glory; they nourish in their hearts—as they are bound to do as a justification of their own existence—feelings of jealousy and suspicion towards their neighbours, until they “stand like greyhounds in the slips straining upon the start,” and then they tell us that all this is done as a security for peace. Let them bring their axiom to the test of experience and historical fact. Never since the world began have there been such enormous preparations for war as there have been in Europe during the last 25 years. But have these preparations for war preserved peace? So far otherwise, that during that period there have been six desolating and sanguinary wars in Europe, in the course of which it is estimated that 2,000,000 of human lives have been sacrificed, and £3,000,000,000. I contend, on the contrary, that these great armaments, so far from being preservatives of peace, are provocatives of war. The existence of such huge masses of armed men ready to be launched forth at any moment at the pleasure of some ambitious Monarch or unscrupulous Minister—for the people have no voice in the making of wars—are a perpetual peril to the peace of nations. I think, therefore, one of our own poets has given wise and sound counsel, when he said—

To extort their truncheons from the puny hands
Of heroes, whose infirm and baby minds
Are gratified with mischief, and who spoil,

What is the true effect of this state of things? One result is that the finances of many, I might say of most, the great States of Europe are in a chronic condition of embarrassment or deficit. Look at Austria. Mr. Martin, in his Statesman's Manual, states that in eight years—between 1870 and 1877—

her accumulated deficit amounted to £33,000,000. In France the same thing was going on even before the tremendous catastrophe of the war with Germany. From 1848 to 1869 her accumulated deficits amounted to £100,000,000. It is difficult to know what is the financial condition of Russia, as no authentic statements are published. But we may be very certain that her finances are in, at least, quite as unsatisfactory a condition as that of any European nation, and we know that her Debt has increased from £208,000,000 in 1865 to £600,000,000 in 1879. And even Germany, in spite of the enormous indemnity she received from France, and with no Debt to speak of, has found her expenditure constantly on the increase, while her revenue has been as steadily diminishing. In 1873 her expenditure, as stated in the Imperial Budget, was 340,000,000 of marks, and in 1878 it was 540,000,000 of marks; or, an increase in the course of five years, of 200,000,000 of marks, or £16,000,000. In consequence, Prince Bismarck has been compelled to impose heavy protective duties, which have very seriously interfered with and damaged the commerce of his own and other countries. Lord Salisbury, speaking at the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, called attention to the heavy protective duties imposed on British goods by some of the Continental Governments, and said—

“The real cause of this increase of protective duties is the establishment of those gigantic military forces which are increasing every year in every one of the larger countries of this hemisphere, which constitute a permanent drain on the forces of industry, a permanent danger to the interests of commerce, and which impose upon the Governments which feel themselves bound—and if one Government does it all Governments have to do it—in order to maintain these forces, the necessity of finding money in some way that shall not too heavily gall the interests and susceptibilities of their people. Indirect taxation, it is well known, is more readily paid than direct taxation, because its amount is not so easily recognized; and it is the necessity of finding the sustenance of those vast armaments that forces Governments to have recourse to indirect taxation, and they naturally avail themselves of the political support which is to be obtained from those trades that wish for protection in order to carry their policy into effect.”

Look, again, at Italy, that young nationality to which the sympathy of all is drawn so strongly. That country is staggering under the weight of a crushing taxation in order to maintain vast and useless armaments. The annual deficits of Italy since 1860 have been so large, varying from £1,743,000 to £24,680,000, that the public debt, which in 1860 stood at £97,480,000, had increased to £400,000,000 in 1876. Well, what is the effect upon the condition of the people? The effect is, that in all the countries of Europe there are multitudes of people—thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands—sunk in poverty, misery, and ignorance. In the language of one of our own poets—

“The racked inhabitants repine, complain,
Taxed till the brow of labour sweats in vain;
War lays a burden on the reeling State,
And peace does nothing to relieve the weight.
Successive loads successive toils impose,

During last winter, I collected a series of extracts from our own and other journals describing the bitter and widespread distress that existed in various parts of Europe. We were told that in Upper Silesia out of a population of 298,000 no fewer than 150,000 “were next door to starvation.” In Hungary, destructive floods had swept away whole villages, and some of the unfortunate inhabitants were found frozen to death in the woods where they had sought shelter. From Cettigne telegrams reported that a sixth part of the population were nearly dying of famine. Miss Irby wrote that in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in the recently-occupied portions of Novi-Bazar, people were dying of want, cold, and hunger. Sir Henry Layard wrote to Lord Salisbury that in Mossul the people were reduced by want to sell their children. In Italy we read of large meetings of working men demanding—not with clamour and menace, but with a really pathetic moderation—that, if the Government wanted them to pay the heavy taxes imposed upon them, they must first find them work by which they could earn bread for themselves and their families. Nearer at home, in Ireland, there has been distress so severe as to approach to famine. And so in most other European countries, especially in those countries where the mania of militarism is pushed to the greatest length. But, in the meanwhile, what are the Governments of this distressed, paralyzed, half-famishing Europe doing? Oh! they are in full and feverish activity, organizing Armies, Navies, and

Reserves; forging rifled cannon, manufacturing Minie rifles and chassepots by the million; building iron-clads and torpedoes; constructing new fortifications; drilling and dragooning the people in martial exercises, and stimulating with lavish rewards the inventors of infernal machines for the destruction of life and property. And thus, the resources of all nations, whether derived from the gifts of Nature or the rewards of industry, instead of being turned to purposes of utility and advantage, are squandered, to use again the words of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the most unsatisfactory and unprofitable of all forms of expenditure. Is it any wonder to find, as we do, that multitudes of people in some European countries are streaming away from their own homes, to seek in foreign lands some rest and relief from this intolerable system of taxation and military servitude? And those who are too poor to emigrate, which is by far the largest number, are driven in sheer desperation into sullen discontent and dangerous conspiracies against the Governments, until Society becomes honeycombed by Socialism, Communism, and Nihilism; while the Governments, instead of removing the causes of these evils, which they dread, seem to have no other resource than to add to the incumbent weight of militarism, which tends only still more to exasperate the angry and mutinous spirit of the people. Now, the question I wish to ask the House to-night is this—Can nothing be done to put some check upon that system? This, of course, is the very knot of the problem with which we have to deal. Of the magnitude of the evil there are no two opinions. All men acknowledge it freely. Even the statesmen who most actively promote it declare, with more or less sincerity, they do so with infinite regret. The more thoughtful among military men, while professing to consider it inevitable, join in the lamentation over such sinister necessity. All our leading statesmen have given their testimony in the same direction, and in powerful and eloquent terms deprecate, deplore, denounce, as preposterous, insane, and ruinous, this system of universal armaments. I have quoted already the words of Lord Salisbury. I could quote equally emphatic words from Lord Derby, from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, when he spoke of "the demon of militarism;" I could quote numberless passages from the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), and a forcible passage from a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). All the journals of the country are constantly denouncing this state of things; but I shall content myself with quoting one sentence from an article which appeared a little time ago in The Times—

"If such a state of things," says The Times, "is permitted to continue, it will be a disgrace to European statesmen; it is upon their shoulders that the real blame will rest."

What, then, are we to do to get rid of this hideous nightmare, which is sitting on the heart of nations and almost suffocating their life? Is what I propose impracticable?—that the different Governments should come to an understanding with a view to the mutual and simultaneous diminution of their armaments. Sir Robert Peel did not think so, when he said—

"Is not the time come when the powerful countries of Europe should reduce those military armaments which they have so sedulously raised? Is not the time come when they should be prepared to declare that there is no use in such overgrown establishments? What is the advantage of one Power greatly increasing its Army and Navy? Does it not see that if it proposes such increase for self protection and defence the other Powers will follow its example? The consequence of this state must be that no increase of relative strength will accrue to any Power; but there must be a universal consumption of the resources of every country in military preparations. . . . The interest of Europe is not that any one Power should exercise a peculiar influence; but the true interest of Europe is to come to some common accord so as to enable every country to reduce those military armaments which belong to a state of war rather than of peace. I do wish that the councils of every country (or that the public voice and mind, if the councils did not) would willingly proclaim that doctrine."

I will now quote the authority of one who will be admitted by Gentlemen opposite to be a great statesman. Lord Beaconsfield, speaking on the 21st of July, 1859, with a special reference to France, said—

"Let us terminate this disastrous system of wild expenditure by mutually agreeing, with no hypocrisy, but in a manner and under circumstances which admit of no doubt, by the reduction of armaments, that peace is really our policy, and then the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) may look forward

her accumulated deficit amounted to £33,000,000. In France the same thing was going on even before the tremendous catastrophe of the war with Germany. From 1848 to 1869 her accumulated deficits amounted to £100,000,000. It is difficult to know what is the financial condition of Russia, as no authentic statements are published. But, in the meanwhile, what are the Governments of this distressed, paralyzed, half-famishing Europe doing? Oh! they are in full and feverish activity, organizing Armies, Navies, and year 1869, Lord Clarendon originated the movement. Communications were opened with various Crowned Heads and leading statesmen of Europe, with a view to bring about a simultaneous reduction of armaments. I do not know why the matter was broken off; but I suppose the Franco-German War put an end to that also. However, it did great credit to Lord Clarendon to have made the effort. In Austria, Dr. Fischhoff, a very distinguished writer, published some important articles in a leading journal of Vienna, which led to the matter being taken up by a considerable party. The result was that 49 Members of the Austrian Parliament, headed by MM. Fux and Heilsberg, have lately laid upon the Table of the House this Resolution—

“The House of Deputies express a hope that the united Imperial and Royal Government may take into consideration the plan of such a general, proportionate, and simultaneous reduction of armaments, as shall not alter the respective position of the States of Europe; and that the Government will not withhold such efforts as may be necessary for the attainment of this object. The Imperial and Royal Government is also besought to bring this Resolution formally before the Minister for Foreign Affairs.”

The Minister of War himself, in his Report on the Army Bill, joyfully hailed the idea of a simultaneous reduction of the Armies of the various States of Europe, and acknowledged the idea as a practical one, which he was willing to support. It may be said there are difficulties in the way; but no great service was ever accomplished for humanity that had not to encounter difficulties. The triumph of true statesmanship is to overcome difficulties. Member concluded by moving the Motion of which he had given Notice.

MR. W. H. JAMES seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with other Powers, with a view to bring about a mutual and simultaneous reduction of European Armaments.”—(Mr. Richard.)

MR. BAXTER said, he was glad, whatever the issue of this Motion might be, that it had afforded to his hon. Friend (Mr. Richard) an opportunity of delivering one of his terse and telling speeches in favour of the good cause he had so much at heart to a far more sympathetic Parliamentary audience than he had ever addressed before upon the policy would be in accord with the spirit of the Motion now before the House.

COLONEL BURNABY would take this opportunity of reminding the House of the words uttered by Lord John Russell at the time of the Duke of Wellington's death, that England had buried a man whose greatest horror was of war. He believed that that feeling was shared by every military man, and by none more than himself. He thought they might congratulate themselves on the fact that this country had never set an example that would encourage other nations to keep up great armaments. He quite agreed that European armaments were at present too large. There were 9,500,000 men under arms at this moment, the odd 500,000 being our own countrymen. That number was as small as it possibly could be consistently with the safety of our shores from invasion. The number of our troops actually under Colours was 135,000. Foreigners often said that our Army made up in efficiency for its want of numbers. One matter for congratulation was the great improvement in our Volunteer Force, which now numbered 200,000 efficient men—24,000 of them trained to the use of the cannon, and this auxiliary would render it unnecessary for England ever to resort to foreign mercenaries, as she did at the time of the Crimean War. He feared it would be found very difficult for any Minister to bring about the disarmament of this country, much as he might wish to do so. The great object which they should keep in view was the uprooting of national rivalries and enmities. Until that object was successfully accomplished he feared foreign countries would turn a deaf ear to any advice we might give them. In conclusion, he urged the House to believe that he and most of his comrades would be very glad to see a reduction in the armaments of Europe, for he had the greatest horror of war in common with the majority of military men.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no desire to obstruct the declaration of opinion by an hon. Gentleman; but the appeal made by me by the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion, and by my right hon. Friend behind me, has been sufficiently pointed to make me think I shall be consulting the convenience of the House if I proceed at once to declare the sentiments with which I regard the proposition itself, and the general opinions upon which it is based; but I must draw a distinction between the basis of this Motion and the opinions and convictions that have been expressed, which I place on one side, and the adoption of a Resolution of this kind by the House at the present moment, the effect of which is not only to indicate a particular course as the course desirable to be pursued; but to indicate that course in such a manner as to commit the House to the proposition that the moment has arrived for taking the step described in the Motion. Now, Sir, upon that subject I will presently state my reasons for being compelled to act and speak with some reserve. With regard to the speech of my hon. Friend, and that of my right hon. Friend behind me, and in the same manner and in the same sense of that speech we have heard from the opposite side of the House, I need hardly say that they command my fullest concurrence. My hon. Friend the Mover of the Resolution before the House has quoted from speeches made by me a strong expression of opinion, not, I am sure, with a desire to catch me tripping by a reference to those speeches, but because he thought that he was expressing the opinions which were really in my mind; and it is, I will at once say, impossible to exaggerate the mischief and the danger attending many of the operations to which he has called our attention. I must, however, point out to my hon. Friend that great operations have been accomplished in Europe in the course of the last 30 years, and that, although those operations have been accomplished by the sad and painful and deplorable, but sometimes necessary, means of war, they have been favourable in the result, in various important instances, to the permanent happiness of mankind. I will now speak of the Crimean War—for in that I had, perhaps, a particular concern—except to say that I do not agree with my hon. Friend in the censure which he passed upon it. But when I consider such great constructive operations as the creation of a really national and united Italy in lieu of the number of sectional fragments of people among whom violence and corruption were resorted to in large portions of their country, if not entirely, to keep down the spirit of freedom and the sentiment of nationality, and to extinguish the glorious traditions of the race, I find, I am sorry to say, that it is not by peaceable means that that great change has been effected. In the same way the reconstruction of Germany, however attained, has been a great advance in the political system of Europe. Nor can I refrain from saying that when I recollect that within the last two years from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 people have obtained a new position, and made a great advance on the road from the most degrading servitude and violence to freedom, and through the means of war, while agreeing with my hon. Friend in everything he says as to the deplorable consequences of war itself, yet I will not travel with him in holding the opinion that those wars—wars of liberty—however we may lament that an end desirable to be attained was not attained by other means, are to be regarded as unmixed evils. As to dynastic wars for the purposes of aggrandisement, needless wars, wanton wars—and I am sorry to say we have not to go far for our experience of them—no words which my hon. Friend can devise, or which the wit of man can invent, are strong enough to describe the folly and the guilt of wars of that description. But I think the distinction is a real one which may be drawn between a war made for lawful purposes, and carried through with benefit to mankind, and wars which have no such justification, and which are to be regarded as among the most terrible plagues that can afflict mankind. Even though we may refrain from censuring the objects of a war, yet I go all lengths with my hon. Friend in expressing a desire that we should endeavour to devise and encourage other more rational, less costly, and less demoralizing means of securing these objects. He has quoted figures which must have startled the House as to the cost of wars. The cost of wars belonging to the present and the past, and the preparations for the future, he places at £500,000,000 a-year in Europe. I wish I could reduce greatly that estimate, but I cannot. I believe my hon. Friend has not greatly overstated the cost of past wars and of the preparations for future wars. I have not had an opportunity of minutely examining the figures; but he was, no doubt, very near the mark when he spoke of £150,000,000 of actual Military Estimates, and I think I am justifying in saying that the consequence of the withdrawal from useful industry to military purposes of a vast number of hands doubles the cost; because not only are men occupied in an employment which does not produce, but they are taken away from the business of production in which they might otherwise be occupied. I am not, of course, saying that this is an argument against adequate, rational, and becoming measures of defence for the security of a country which is bound to have regard to its own safety; nor am I contending that the pecuniary aspect of the question is the whole, or even the most important part of the various branches of the subject. But if my hon. Friend, on account of the withdrawal of labour from peaceful industry to warlike purposes, doubles the £150,000,000 I cannot find fault with him. We have, first, to consider the effect of the War Estimates; next, the withdrawal of labour from other pursuits; and, thirdly, the consequences of former wars of which we are now bearing the charge. In this matter it is wonderful to see how much more easy it is to judge our ancestors than ourselves. It is exactly the case of judging one's neighbour as compared with oneself. It is very easy for us to find out that other nations are extravagant in the military and naval establishments which they maintain; but the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Burnaby) has told us that his friends in foreign armies have pressed the point upon him that we have the advantage of an insular position, and that we ought, in consequence, to be able to afford a better example to the world. I shall not enter into any argument on that point at present; but I may observe that, as a general rule, the wars which have led to the creation of the National Debts of the world have been chiefly dynastic or religious or re-actionary wars, and almost all of them wrong and unjust. If those wars have left behind them National Debts now passing £4,000,000,000—I was not aware that the figures were quite so high—there has to be paid in the shape of interest an amount little short of £160,000,000, to be added to the £150,000,000 which my hon. Friend has mentioned in his computation. I am afraid, therefore, that £450,000,000 or £500,000,000 is somewhere about the actual charge to Europe for past wars and its present preparations for the same purposes. That is the pecuniary view of the matter; but there is a point at which this pecuniary question becomes connected with another question. My hon. Friend was quite right when he said that, in many countries, what may be called war interests are created by the extraordinary expenditure which is indulged in. The case of the Cape of Good Hope has been quoted, and I do not think a fairer or better instance could be cited. Nothing can be so ruinous to a country, nothing so mischievous as to its progress and the formation of a just civilization, as to be in the position which we have too often witnessed in the case of the inhabitants of our own Colonies in later times, of having the privilege of provoking wars for which they were not called upon to pay. When we say to a community—"We will pay the expenses of your wars," they may imagine that we are conferring upon them a great favour; but I believe their worst enemies could not devise a scheme more lowering to the character of free citizens in a free State. Going back to the debates of 30 or 40 years, we find Mr. Cobden in a very marked degree, and Sir Robert Peel in a degree less marked, but, no doubt, not less sincere, even then deploring the enormous scale on which the military establishments of Europe were maintained, and the tendency of those military establishments not to preserve peace, but to weaken the securities for its continuance. Since that period—since Sir Robert Peel thought it his duty in his place in Parliament to call attention to the dangers which menaced Europe through the maintenance of needless establishments—these establishments have been in some cases doubled, or trebled, and the cost of them is advancing at, perhaps, even a greater rate. Amid all our boasts of civilization—amid all our ideas of incessant progress—we have this sad, almost plague spot, as it may be called, upon us; and, as my hon. Friend says, we delude ourselves with the notion and cling to the idle and empty formula—for such it has become—that to be prepared for war is the best way to avert it. My hon. Friend has said, and said with truth, that at one time an endeavour was made by Lord Clarendon, in conjunction with the Government of which I had the honour to be the head in 1869, to set in motion if we could some small measure, at least as a beginning, of disarmament. It was not an attempt to combine the armed nations of Europe for that purpose. Lord Clarendon's belief, in which I still share, was that if you could gather the Plenipotentiaries of Europe round a table to hear a discussion on disarmament, their meetings would end in no positive and substantial result, and that the only way in which a measure of disarmament can be initiated is in detail. It is to take advantage of some occasion when particular countries are in face of each other—burdening their own people, exhausting their own resources, and endangering peace—and to endeavour to prevail on them relatively to these particular circumstances to pursue a more rational course. Lord Clarendon was apprehensive, in 1869, of those difficulties with respect to which his prognostications were but too speedily and surely verified. He thought the relations between France and Germany were menacing to Europe; and he endeavoured to prevail on those two countries to begin the good work of some small measure of disarmament. It is not for me to refer to this matter in the character of a judge between those two great countries. What happened was simply this: The French Government adopted the first part of Lord Clarendon's proposal to this extent—that they offered to make a reduction in their Army of 10,000 men. It was not a large reduction; but it was a reduction. On the other hand, the Government of Germany stated that the force they had under arms was smaller in proportion to their population than the force of France, and that, consequently, they could not undertake to make any reduction whatever. That is the history of the effort made by Lord Clarendon; and I would ask my hon. Friend to note that the effort made in 1869 was not forced upon the Government by any Parliamentary movement. It was an effort made by them spontaneously, and from a desire, if possible, to make some progress, however small, in the beginning of an undertaking which would, if it acquired any considerable development, be of immeasurable benefit to Europe. It is on that ground I ask my hon. Friend not to compel me to vote upon his Motion. What I would say to my hon. Friend is this: If he has reason to suspect a want of inclination on the part of the Government to move in the direction of promoting peace and pacific means in the reduction of armaments, then he would be perfectly justified, whatever our general political relations may be, in striving to force the Motion upon us. But if he really believes that we are associated with him in the desire he entertains, then I would ask my hon. Friend to allow us some discretion in regard to the time and the circumstances of our action. With regard to addressing other Powers upon the question, that is a very serious step. When Lord Clarendon made overtures to France and Germany, there was nothing in our policy in any portion of the globe that at all weakened our position or made it otherwise than desirable to be the authors of such overtures. This was an essential point. It was necessary that we should stand recti in curia, and that we should not be met with the remark—"What are you doing yourselves? You preach the gospel of peace; but are your hands free from the stain of blood? Have you purged yourselves effectually from that stain? Have you retired from the positions into which you have been driven?" I need not enter into particulars; it is not necessary, for everyone would understand the allusions I might make. I hope my hon. Friend will agree with me that we must have some regard to the situation in which we are able to place ourselves before we undertake the lofty and, in certain circumstances, the pretentious office of instructing other nations. There are, in my opinion, three distinct modes by which, apart from application to other Powers, the Government of this country may walk in the direction indicated by my hon. Friend. The first and the most essential is that they shall pursue a foreign policy of peace and justice. Unless they do that, the words of admonition they may use to others will be a bitter mockery in the estimate of others. The second condition is that they shall study to the best of their ability whether they can honestly moderate their defensive establishments. That is a point on which Her Majesty's Government are not in a position at this very early period of their existence to make any announcement or to give any definite promise. Of course, when I speak of moderate establishments I estimate moderation by the just proportion between the real demands of the country for its honour and its safety and the charge and the extent of establishments which are required by Parliament and by the people in order to maintain these essential things. There is a third way, however, in which I think it is in the power of the Government to qualify itself for becoming a missionary for those beneficial purposes which are contemplated by my hon. Friend; that is, by showing their disposition, when they are themselves engaged in controversy, to adopt those amicable and pacific means of escape from their disputes rather than to resort to war. Need I assure my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Baxter) that the dispositions which led us to become parties to the arbitration on the Alabama case are still with us the same as ever; that we are not discouraged; that we are not daunted in the exercise of these feelings by the fact that we were amerced, and severely amerced, by the sentence of the International Tribunal; and that, although we may think the sentence was harsh in its extent, and unjust in its basis, we regard the fine imposed on this country as dust in the balance compared with the moral value of the example set when these two great nations of England and America—which are among the most fiery and the most jealous in the world with regard to anything that touches national honour—went in peace and concord before a judicial tribunal to dispose of these painful differences, rather than to resort to the arbitrament of the sword. These are the means by which I think it is in the power of the Government at all events to prepare the way for holding the language of peace, and even for recommending on the proper occasion disarmament among the assembled Powers of Europe. Some time must, in my judgment, elapse before these conditions can have been sufficiently realized in our case to qualify us for the duties which my hon. Friend benevolently and philanthropically wishes us to undertake. My hon. Friend has been referring, as I have been referring myself, to the proceedings of Mr. Cobden on this subject. In 1849 Mr. Cobden made a Motion very closely corresponding in its terms with that of my hon. Friend. On that occasion, when Mr. Cobden had in view something of the nature of general disarmament, Lord Palmerston made a speech expressing his great admiration of the sentiments of Mr. Cobden, and expressing the conviction, which I entirely share, that a discussion of this kind is not a thing to be viewed with jealousy or grudge, but to be regarded as an opportunity—a beneficial opportunity—of declaring one's opinion on matters of the highest importance. Lord Palmerston, on that occasion, moved the Previous Question, in order that he might not appear to negative Mr. Cobden's Motion. Mr. Cobden, however, thought fit on that occasion to go to a division. In the year 1851 Mr. Cobden renewed his Motion in substance, but gave it a more specific application, and made it refer only to the relations between England and France. He moved an Address to Her Majesty, praying her—

“To enter into communication with the Government of France, and endeavour to prevent in future that rivalry of warlike preparation in time of Peace, which has hitherto been the policy of the two Governments, and to promote, if possible, a mutual reduction of armaments.”

I am interested in finding a difference between Mr. Cobden's two Motions, because I think he perceived that an attempt to act on all Powers simultaneously was not as likely to succeed as an invitation to one other Power to enter into communication with a view to disarmament. On the occasion in question Lord Palmerston said—

“I am glad that the hon. Member for the West Riding has taken advantage of this meeting of the world (the Exhibition of 1851) to declare in his place in Parliament those principles of universal peace which do honour to him and the country in which they are proclaimed; and, if I object to being sent bound and fettered into a negotiation through which I confess I cannot see my practical way, it is not because I object to the end the hon. Member desires and proposes to accomplish, but because I think that end is more likely to be accelerated by the language of the hon. Member, and the sentiments he and the House have expressed, than it would be by the particular and specific Motion he has this evening brought before us.”—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 941.]

He went on to say—

“Her Majesty's Government feel as ardently on the subject as any man in this country or in the world can do; and as far as their influence, and power, and persuasion may extend, they will, so long as it may be their lot to have anything to do with the affairs of the country, use every effort in their power to avert the miseries and calamities of war.”—[Ibid.]

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. Cobden expressed his unfeigned satisfaction with the tone of the debate and with the declaration of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, and withdrew his Motion without pressing it to a division. I venture to express my hope that that course may be taken by my hon. Friend on the present occasion. It is not desirable, under present circumstances, that the House should place the Government in a position in which they would be compelled either to seem to slight the great authority of the House, or to be driven at a time which we do not believe yet to be ripe or opportune to make overtures to other Powers of the world under circumstances and at a moment from which we could not anticipate beneficial results.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that while he was prepared to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Merthyr, he was also ready to acquiesce in its withdrawal, or in any course his hon. Friend might think it wise to take after the speech of the Prime Minister. He quite appreciated the force of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Gladstone's) remarks, and understood that in many cases it was more easy to teach by precept than by example. He could not help thinking that in the present complicated state of Europe the great armaments which they saw were as much a result as a cause. He could not help feeling that the unhappy state of the political organization of many countries, the unhappy union of Provinces that ought more properly to be parted, and the separation of States and sections of States from their natural connection, led to that antagonism between nation and nation which had its natural outcome in those increased armaments which had been referred to. He did not wish to particularize by illustrations, because where responsible Ministers shrank from pointing their remarks by apposite illustrations which were in the minds of all, it was better for others to follow the example of eloquent silence. In the Parliament of England and in the House of Commons they had a right, as it was their duty, first of all to look at home, to do what was practical, and to ask themselves whether, in proclaiming their love for peace and disinclination to armaments and military preparations, it was not possible to do something to give effect to their views. The course of this country ought to be one of peaceful progress, not of military aggression; and the expression which that sentiment had found in the House of Commons in the course of that debate would strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government if they should choose to enter on a course of peace and military retrenchment. It was perhaps by example that they could best promote the course the hon. Member for Merthyr had at heart. He feared that if they were to go at that moment into the councils of Europe, and invite the nations to simultaneous disarmament, they would say—"Would you guarantee us against the consequences of the jealousies and hatreds resulting from past wars? Will you secure to us that the state of Europe, so eminently unstable, shall become stable?" When they thought of these things they must see that it was difficult, say even for such a country as Spain, to consent to something which involved the relinquishment of an object of national longing on their part. He thought, considering all these things, it was more possible for them to do something by acting on those organizations where they were complete masters of the situation within the region of their own authority and political responsibility, and then, when they had washed their hands of that blood of aggression of which many of them felt that they were guiltily enjoying the gains, they might go, fortified by example, and speak a word of counsel that might be advantageous in Europe.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought they might all be satisfied at hearing that the spirit of the Government was in favour of the Motion of his hon. Friend. In the belief that that opinion deserved to be recorded he would propose an Amendment to that effect; but before doing so he wished to observe that he would not be the first to denounce the employment of force for a just object. Almost the first speech he had the honour of making in that House was a speech distinctly in favour of the employment of force for the procuring of what he believed to be just ends. He would not, therefore, engage in any abstract condemnation of war when justified by such an object. The Prime Minister referred to the case of Italy. No one could deny that the unification of Italy, which had given so much satisfaction, could not have been produced so soon, if at all in this generation, if force had not been employed. The Austrian Government did not withdraw its forces from Lombardy and Venice from any conviction of the injustice of its domination over the Italian people. Nor was it simply from a feeling of injustice on the part of the Bourbon dynasty that the Two Sicilies became lost to them. He would have been glad if in the course of recent years a desire had been shown by the British Government and Parliament for the promotion of the great work of liberation further in the East of Europe. All that brought him to the conclusion that if there was a desire to promote peace and the disarmament of Europe their efforts must be primarily devoted to the establishment of just international relations in Europe. It was in the establishment of justice between nations that they should have the best security for the establishment of peace between nations. As long as they had injustice between nations they could not possibly prevent a spirit of international antipathy from being maintained, nor avert the danger of war. The Government over which the Prime Minister formerly presided did something towards establishing partial disarmament between France and Germany. When the Franco-German War unhappily seemed to be certain they entered into a Treaty with the two principals in that war, by which they bound themselves by certain definite obligations to incur the risk of hostilities in order to maintain the just rights of Belgium. No act of the Government could be regarded with greater satisfaction. But the Prime Minister would forgive him when he said that he wished the conclusion of the Franco-German War had been accompanied by some similar act. They all knew perfectly well that there was no danger to the peace of Europe so formidable as the terms of the Treaty between France and Germany which closed that war. The French were not satisfied; the Germans were apprehensive. Therefore, the terms of that Treaty were a standing menace to Europe. He was speaking in ignorance of the efforts of Her Majesty's Government at the time; but he would have been glad if there had been some public record that they had approached the two belligerents and proffered to enter into some engagement which, upon a just termination of the war, should have bound the Powers of Europe to maintain that just termination. That would have been a real step towards peace. But, as he said before, he rose to move an Amendment to which he hoped Her Majesty's Government would assent, an Amendment which would enunciate the sentiments which had been heard with great satisfaction from the Prime Minister, and which might satisfy the ambition of his hon. Friend (Mr. Richard) by putting on record the policy of England on the matter. He begged to move to omit all the words after the word "that" in order to insert—

"In the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government on all occasions, when circumstances admit of it, to recommend to Foreign Governments the reduction of European Armaments."

MR. W. FOWLER seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government on all occasions, when circumstances admit of it, to recommend to Foreign Governments a reduction of European Armaments,"—(Mr. Courtney),—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: I should rather acquiesce than concur in the adoption of this Amendment, but simply upon the ground that I am not friendly, as a general rule, to the assertion by the House of Commons of propositions not susceptible of immediate application to practice. I doubt the policy of it. At the same time, I should not wish, in the present state of things, to go so far as to resist the passing of the Amendment, embodying, as it does, what is undoubtedly true, and what is likewise in itself of the highest importance. I therefore will not take any steps, even by moving the Previous Question, to prevent the adoption of the Amendment, if there be a general wish in the House to adopt it; but, on the ground I have stated, I confess I should not have recommended that course.

MR. RICHARD expressed the extreme satisfaction with which he had listened to what he must call the magnificent speech of the Prime Minister, which was one of the most eloquent expositions of the policy of peace he had ever heard, and its effect, he was sure, would be most beneficial. He would withdraw his Motion; but it would be very gratifying if the Prime Minister would allow the Amendment of the hon. Member for Liskeard to be passed without a division.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government on all occasions, when circumstances admit of it, to recommend to Foreign Governments a reduction of European Armaments.

3. That we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the said Petition relates.

4. We further report that the said Petition contained a claim to the seat and also of a scrutiny. This portion of the Petition was subsequently abandoned.

The Respondent set up a recriminatory case which was also abandoned.

We have no grounds for making any further Special Report.

WICKLOW ELECTION.

High Court of Justice in Ireland.
Common Pleas Division.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

In the matter of the Election Petition for the County of Wicklow.

William Wentworth FitzWilliam Dick, Petitioner; James Carlisle McCoan and Howard Brooke, Respondents.

The said Common Pleas Division, in pursuance of the provisions of the 36th section of the said Act, do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons,—

That the Petition in this matter, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, was duly presented to this Division on the 3rd day of May 1880, and that the Petitioner, on the 14th day of June inst., applied to the Court, by special application, pursuant to the said statute, for leave to withdraw said Petition.

And it appearing to the Court that the notice of the said application required by the said Act had been given in the said County, and no person having applied to be substituted as Petitioner instead of the said William Wentworth FitzWilliam Dick, the Court, on the said 14th day of June inst., made an order permitting the said Petition to be withdrawn, and the same has been withdrawn accordingly.

And the Court do hereby report that, in their opinion, the withdrawal of the said Petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other Petition.

Signed on behalf of the Court, this 15th day of June 1880.

M. MORRIS,
C. J. C. Pleas.

And the said Certificate and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Gravesend; and from Lord Chief Justice Morris, one of the Judges selected in pursuance of the same Act, a Report relating to the Election for the County of Wicklow.

GRAVESEND ELECTION.

To the Rt. Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honorable George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, knight, two of the Judges of the High Court of Justice, and Judges for the time being assigned for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, certify that upon the 31st day of May and several days following, we duly held a Court in the Borough of Gravesend for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Sir Francis Wyatt Truscott, knight, Petitioner; and Thomas Bevan, Respondent; and, in further pursuance of the said Act, We determined that the said Thomas Bevan was not duly returned nor elected, and that the said Election was void.

And we now certify such our determination to you according to the Statute.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, We, in further pursuance of the said Act, report as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the said trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices within the meaning of The Corrupt Practices Act, 1854. And that the nature of the corrupt practices proved, and the names of the persons against whom they were proved, are as follows:—

Robert Williams, Henry Howard, William Bedman, James Weeks,	} Of bribing.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TOWN COUNCILS (ALDERMEN) BILL.

(Mr. James, Lord Ramsay, Mr. Dillwyn.)

[BILL 133.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. H. JAMES, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, remarked that the office of Alderman was very ancient; but there was an impression that it had degenerated into a somewhat useless office. It was originally a combination of duties partly local and partly magisterial; and it was, as they all knew, derived from Anglo-Saxon times. It was aspired to as being a stepping-stone to the highest office of local government—that of Mayor—of the various municipalities throughout the United Kingdom. The measure introduced by Lord John Russell in 1835 for the reform of the Municipal Corporations proposed the abolition of the aldermanic office; but Lord Lyndhurst carried an Amendment in the House of Peers, to the effect that one-fourth of each Town Council should consist of Aldermen to be elected for life. This Amendment was opposed in the Commons, and after a good deal of discussion it was proposed that one-third of the Aldermen should be appointed for six years, and that half of them should retire every three years. A conference of the two Houses was then held and the compromise was then accepted. The Bill was only passed on the explicit understanding that the question of a self-elected body existing within the Town Councils should be reconsidered at an early date. Other matters of greater importance intervened, and the consequence was that the state of things then introduced had remained unchanged down to the present time, although great dissatisfaction had arisen in many boroughs—notably Leicester, Leeds, and Winchester, where resolutions had been passed for an alteration in the law. In some instances the Town Council had, in the election of Aldermen, wholly disregarded the deliberately expressed opinions of the ratepayers. To remedy this state of things, his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) introduced in 1875 a Bill which was intended to provide for the appointment of Aldermen by the cumulative vote. There being many objections to the principle of cumulative voting, the House could not accede to the proposal; but the Government thought the circumstances submitted by the hon. Member for Leicestershire were sufficiently grave to induce them to take up the question, and the late Secretary and the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department expressed themselves entirely in favour of the general principles advocated by the introducer of the Bill, and promised to deal with the subject at a future time. Indeed, the Home Secretary moved the Previous Question on the distinct understanding that he would deal with the subject in another year. But nothing was done, and the matter still remained unsettled. The proposal of his Bill was perhaps the simplest and most moderate in its tone that anyone could make. It proposed that no Alderman hereafter elected should be entitled to give his vote for the election of another Alderman, and thus perpetuate a system of self-election which was diametrically opposed to the views held by all parties in that House in regard to local government generally. One of the results following from the prevalence of the present system was that it tended to encourage the introduction of Party politics in municipal bodies, the general rule being that the election of Mayor indicated the political majority of the Corporation, and the result was generally determined by the number of Liberal or Conservative Aldermen. At the municipal elections of last year it was stated that in no less than 72 cases the results were regarded by one side or the other as Party gains or losses; and it was a fact that the prevalence of Party feeling and motive in these elections had greatly increased of late years. Their desire must be that the best men should fill municipal offices; but under the present system men were made Aldermen not on that ground, and many were elected after they had been rejected by the ratepayers. He hoped that the Government would state definitely what course they intended to take in regard to the question; and he trusted that the House would state its opinion strong enough to show that the office was a useless one, and that this Bill ought to be passed into law this Session. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. H. James.)

MR. GOURLEY did not think that his hon. Friend had proved that the office of an Alderman was more useless than that of a Town Councillor. It was an office almost invariably conferred for services rendered to the public; and he did not understand why those who held it should be supposed to be specially incompetent to vote on municipal questions in the Council. He believed that the measure had been introduced with regard to the borough of Liverpool, and a few other corporate towns, where a certain political Party had obtained a preponderating influence in the Town Councils. No demand had been made on the part of the boroughs by ratepayers or public bodies for the change now proposed. The true solution of the difficulty, if there really was a difficulty, would be found in leaving the elections in the hands of the ratepayers. If the ratepayers found that there was any necessity for the discontinuance or a change in current of aldermanic seats, they would be sure to exert themselves and make a change. If they were to prevent an Alderman from voting for Aldermen, they might as well debar him from giving any vote at all. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. ROWLEY HILL seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Gourley.)

MR. CAINE said, the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) had put the whole question in a nutshell when he urged that, under the present arrangement, the whole system of popular representation was set aside. At Liverpool in particular the results of the present system were extremely unsatisfactory. If Town Councillors were elected for four years, then he would suggest that at the end of the third year the senior should take the office of Alderman. Such a mode of nomination would bring about a better arrangement than that which existed at present. He even wished that his hon. Friend had brought in a Bill to abolish the office of Alderman altogether; but, as that was not now proposed, he sincerely trusted that this Bill would become law, and be in operation next November. They would have better and more popular municipal government under its provisions.

MR. DALY stated that, having a lengthened experience as Alderman, he could not admit the principle of the present Bill or the remedy proposed. If the promoters of the Bill had been more courageous, and had endeavoured to assimilate the principle of election in the English municipalities to the principle existing in the Irish boroughs, they would have contributed in a much greater degree to the interests of the country. If they were to consider the operation of the recent laws as connected with the administration of the Corporations, one could hardly fail to be struck with the important duties which now devolve upon Corporations. A Corporation was the instrument by which all the sanitary laws were put into operation. It had the power of enabling a city to become healthy or not; it had the power to control the sewers of the city; and it had the power to compel the owners of property to effect such sanitary measures as conduced to the health of the city. Now, the principle of election was a faulty one where the burgesses had not the power of affirming or condemning the action of Aldermen. The principle of election existing in Irish municipal boroughs was that Town Councillors should present themselves for election every three years, and Aldermen every six years, whether he be a new man or a tried one. Such a system was much more perfect than that existing in England, because it gave to the constituencies the opportunity of expressing their approbation or disapprobation of the members of the Town Council. He himself had had the opportunity of recognizing the influence of what was called new blood; and he found that the real operation of the municipal laws depended to a great extent upon the activity of the persons constituting the Corporation. Of late years a great deal of activity had been displayed in the Municipal Corporations, owing to the pressure put upon them by their constituents. Returning to the measure before the House, he repeated that the principle of the Bill was faulty and defective, and that the remedy proposed was defective, inasmuch as it practically disqualified certain of the representatives of the constituency. He therefore recommended to the hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure to have a little more courage, and bring in a Bill which would provide that the Aldermen should be elected by the constituency they had to represent.

MR. LEWIS FRY pointed out that in Bristol a considerable proportion of the gentlemen who filled the office of Aldermen were young men, and, as in many other towns, very few of the Aldermen had previously been elected Councillors. He considered that the more Party feeling was kept in abeyance the better it would be for the conduct of their municipal affairs, and the present system had rather a tendency to promote and increase Party feeling, because there was a strong sense of dissatisfaction on the part of the ratepayers when they felt that their opinion was not represented by the majority of the Town Council. With respect to the present proposal, he rather thought that the preferable remedy would be to repeal that provision of the Municipal Corporations Act which enabled the Town Council to elect Aldermen from gentlemen who were not members of the municipal body; but the present state of things was so very unsatisfactory that he should support the Bill as a protest against it.

MR. DAWSON agreed with the hon. Member for Cork that there ought to be a more radical measure to remedy the existing evil. He would support the Bill as a step in advance; but he trusted that at no distant day the more radical measure indicated by his hon. Friend would be introduced. He was anxious to assimilate laws of Ireland to those of England from which the Irish people would derive a benefit; and he likewise very much wished to assimilate laws of England to those of Ireland by which the English people would get a benefit. In Ireland an Alderman was elected, in the first instance, by having a majority of votes of the ratepayers; and, therefore, the will of the ratepayers was entirely carried out in the matter. In England it appeared that Aldermen were elected from an already elected body; and he always looked with very grave suspicion upon elections which were of such a very circumscribed character. He considered that the ratepayers should have the selection, in the first instance, of the entire Corporation, and that when they had served a certain period, and had got an acquaintance with all the minute and multifarious details of the work required of them, the Aldermen should be chosen, not by themselves, but by the constituents. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend that if a man had served for four years in the Council, and had shown very great attention and assiduity in his work, he was entitled to be promoted, and that his power to do good would be greatly increased. It was a very lamentable thing even in Ireland to see some new person, for reasons thoroughly apart from his qualifications, made Alderman and put over the heads of those who had probably served a diligent apprenticeship in the Town Council. Such a thing, it appeared, was done in England in a more dangerous manner. The hon. Member for Cork had spoken of the daily increasing duties which had been put on the various municipalities by the Acts which had been passed in recent years. Now, it was necessary that the men who came to administer these laws should have had experience in sanitary matters. In England the Corporations had to deal somewhat with educational matters; and they had the power of instituting reforms and inculcating social habits which, he believed, more than any restrictive laws, would prevent excesses which they all deplored. He should support the present Bill, trusting, however, that a more complete measure would shortly be introduced.

MR. ROWLEY HILL did not deny that the position of Alderman was an exceedingly anomalous one, but thought that the remedy proposed would be worse than the evil which the hon. Member for Gateshead sought to remove. So long as Aldermen were by law made members of Town Councils, and invested with all the duties and responsibilities of Town Councillors, so long it seemed to him it would be perfectly inconsistent that their power to vote should be limited on any occasion where their personal interest was not concerned. The point dealt with by the Bill was not the only one in which the municipal laws required amendment. He objected to a piecemeal measure, and hoped that the Government would introduce before long a more extensive reform.

MR. CAUSTON desired to call the attention of the House to a state of things in the borough of Colchester, which he had the honour to represent. For 43 years the Conservatives had had the ascendancy in the Council—in fact, a Liberal Alderman had never been elected since 1836, until the February of this year. That was only because the Liberals were fortunate enough at the last municipal election to secure 13 representatives out of 18 elected Town Councillors. He ought, in the first instance, to state how the Corporation of Colchester was constituted. It was comprised of 18 Town Councillors and 6 Aldermen. At the last election of Aldermen the Town Councillors consisted of 10 Liberals and 8 Conservatives; but although the former were in a majority they had no control over the election of Aldermen, because the Aldermen who had previously been elected, not by the voice of the town, but by one another, were able to out-vote those who really represented the popular feeling of the town. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland said that, as a rule, Aldermen were elected from the Town Councillors. He should like to point out that during the last 43 years, although the Conservatives of Colchester had had the control of the election of Aldermen, only two had been chosen in that time who had ever received any votes from the ratepayers. That was an evil which ought not to exist. The hon. Member for Sunderland had also said he would like to leave the matter in the hands of the ratepayers. He (Mr. Causton) believed that that was very desirable; and he thought that if they provided that Aldermen should have no control over the election of Aldermen, the matter would virtually be left in the hands of the ratepayers. He thought, moreover, that it was very desirable that the Town Council should have the power to elect as Aldermen gentlemen who, not caring to go through a contested election, were able and willing to render considerable service to their fellow-townsmen. It would be admitted by both sides in the borough of Colchester that there had been men in this position; but simply because they happened to be Liberals the Tories had made use of their power to keep them out. Fortunately, the Liberals were now in the possession of power which would possibly give them control over the election of Aldermen for the next 30 or 40 years, whether this Bill passed or not. They had now 13 Town Councillors and 1 Alderman out of a total of 24. He trusted, therefore, that it would not be imputed that he was making this speech for any Party purpose. He thought the measure a wise and just one, which ought to pass, and hoped the House would allow it to become law before the end of the Session.

MR. GILL desired, as a member of the Corporation of Dublin, to make one or two observations on the Bill. Some of his hon. Friends on the Opposition side of the House had suggested the assimilating of the election of Aldermen in England. In Ireland an Alderman held office three years, at the end of that time the Alderman had to go before his constituents, and in all respects his election was the same as that of a Town Councillor. As an instance of how Aldermen did not always please their constituents, he might state that he knew of many cases in which they had lost their seats as Aldermen, but had been given another chance as Town Councillors. If they did not please their constituents in that capacity, they had at the following election been turned out. He thought that the hon. Gentlemen in charge of the present Bill ought to try to assimilate as near as they could the law of England in that respect with that of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman had said he would like to see Aldermen abolished altogether. He did not see any necessity for that, for he thought that by limiting their powers everything would be done that was necessary. They might have some slight advantage over Town Councillors; but not the very great advantage which they appeared to have in the English municipalities. As far as he could make out the municipal feelings of the ward, it would be much better represented by the adoption of the Irish system of election, for then there could be no such thing as a close constituency. He had made those observations in the hope that the hon. Members who brought forward the Bill, and for which he intended to vote as an advance towards a better state of things, would go more rapidly so work, and bring in a Bill something after the lines he and his Irish Friends had indicated.

MR. STEVENSON said, that the recommendation of the Bill, to his mind, was its moderate character, and entitled to every support. The anomalies complained of must be dealt with; but not by the adoption of the cumulative vote, as had been proposed in previous Sessions. Their object in those days should be to strengthen the municipal institutions of the country; and that would be done by making them more directly representative. At the same time, it was most important that the knowledge of men who had experience of municipal business should be retained and made available for the service of the public. As a friend of the continuance of the Aldermanic system, and to remove the blot upon it, he supported the Bill.

MR. A. H. BROWN observed, that in most boroughs the position of Aldermen was the reward of political service. That was not good for the municipality; and as he thought this Bill took a small step towards improving the present state of things he would support it.

MR. BARRAN said, that Liverpool and Bristol had been brought very prominently before the House in relation to the injustice done to the ratepayers by the existing law. Now, he was very much inclined to think that if Bristol and Liverpool had had a representation on the Aldermanic Bench of a different hue, they would very likely have heard nothing of the inequalities in those two great cities. The fact that in Liverpool the Conservatives had had for many years a majority in the Town Council had very naturally created dissatisfaction on the part of the opposing political Party. As far as Liverpool was concerned, he thought matters were improving. At the last municipal election the return of Liberals was far in excess of Conservatives, who at present held power in the Corporation; and he thought that before long the position of parties would be reversed. As to Bristol, he would tell them what was necessary to be done, and they would soon see a different state of things. The inequality of representation in Bristol was very manifest. The wards of the borough were not wards which represented the population, and they were very unequally distributed. The remedy for this evil was that there should be some inexpensive and speedy mode of distributing voting power, in order that a fair representation of the burgesses might be sent to the Town Council. They had been told that they were to be careful not to cast any reflection upon, or to diminish the power or influence of, the Municipal Corporations; and he was of that opinion, because, considering the great and important work which they had done, and considering the responsibility which had rested upon them, and the very efficient way in which they had done their work—they ought to be very careful indeed not to take any steps which would tend to diminish the confidence of the general public in these institutions. Let them reflect upon what had been done since the passing of the Municipal Act. Birmingham was a noble example of what had been done in the way of enterprise in providing for all the necessities of the town and its development, structurally and otherwise. The borough which he had the honour to represent had not been by any means behind in the work that it had done. In the establishment of their large public library, an institution which was circulating at the present time more than 50,000 volumes free to the ratepayers, they had something of which they might be justly proud; and the provision they had made with regard to gas and water and other things was of a character and on a scale worthy of them as a Corporation. In the Corporation of Leeds they had a large preponderance of one political Party, and they had had that for a great many years. Mr. Wheelhouse, his late Colleague, introduced a Bill into Parliament for the purpose of securing the election of Aldermen by the cumulative vote. If it had not been that in Leeds the Liberals predominated in the Town Council, they would never have heard of the suggestion. Therefore he was of opinion that to confine this kind of legislation to exceptional circumstances was undesirable. Although in Leeds they had a preponderance of Liberals in the Town Council, they had only used their power occasionally for the purpose of electing gentlemen outside to the Aldermanic Bench; the last instance was the hon. Gentleman who now represented the Eastern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The argument used by the Town Council of Leeds was this—that unless a man was prepared to present himself to the burgesses of the borough, and was willing to go through the ordeal of a contested election, if necessary, he was not entitled to the confidence and support of the Corporation as an Alderman. The Aldermen of Leeds were elected to the office on account of their qualifications for the office. Almost all their committees were presided over by Aldermen; and he thought he might say that the business of the Corporation of Leeds was conducted in such a way as to give satisfaction to the general body of ratepayers. Liverpool, Bristol, and Colchester had been specially referred to in the course of the debate as places in which an unsatisfactory state of things existed. Was that the fault of the institution, or the fault of the Party? and if the Party pursued a course of this kind—if it disregarded the claims of individuals, and also disregarded the demands of the constituency for justice and fair play—then make whatever law they might these men would still evade it. In the case of Bristol and Liverpool, he believed that the unsatisfactory state of affairs could be reversed. If the city of Bristol were to memorialize Parliament some steps would be taken to remedy the evils which existed there.

MR. LEWIS FRY said, that a Bill had passed during the present Session to alter the distribution of the municipal representation in Bristol, and thus to remedy the evils to some extent.

MR. BARRAN was very glad that such a Bill had passed, which would remedy the evil. It would then be found that the ratepayers of Bristol had the power in their own hands. If they were going to discourage household suffrage because it did not result in sending certain men to the Councils of their boroughs, they would have to pursue a course which, he believed, would be destructive to the best interests of their municipal institutions. The Corporations of England were representative so far as the Town Councillors were concerned, and those Town Councillors were bound to obey the behests of the burgesses. If a Corporation, say the Corporation of Leeds, were to elect Aldermen who were distasteful to the general burgesses of the town, rest assured that the electors would at once say that men who voted for persons as Aldermen who were distasteful to the people should not be returned again to the Council. The burgesses had the remedy in their own hands; and he was quite sure that, by a fair distribution of the voting power in the towns of England for the purpose of electing Town Councillors, an influence could be produced which would tell favourably in the election of Aldermen. He hoped nothing would be done in legislation of this kind which would for one moment cast a reflection on the institutions which had done so much good, and which, he believed, were destined to do much more in the future.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that hon. Gentlemen who had already spoken on this subject had alluded to particular boroughs; but, for his part, he thought it ought to be considered on its general merits. While he fully acknowledged that the Bill was one which might be called piecemeal legislation, he felt disposed to support it, at any rate, as a provisional measure. At the same time, he must say that he should very much like that Her Majesty's Government should make some statement to the effect that they would undertake, in a general measure, to deal not only with this, but with other matters connected with municipal government. There ought, in his opinion, to be some self-acting machinery to re-adjust the representation of the people in proportion to the population. It was very desirable that the gentlemen elected to the Town Councils should reflect the sentiments of the time in the borough, for all institutions ought to be in harmony with the existing sentiments, and not with the past sentiments of the people. This was not a Party question, because they knew perfectly well that in some boroughs Conservatives were in the majority, and in others Liberals had the preponderating influence in the Town Councils. They also knew that, in many of those boroughs, the stronger Party for the time being had used its power to perpetuate a system which was not in harmony with the views of the electors generally. That state of things he regarded as mischievous. That was only part of a great question of municipal reform. There was a large number of boroughs in which the wards were grossly unequal. In considering the general question of municipal administration, it was important to devise some easy self-acting machinery, in order to bring the Town Councils into immediate harmony with the sentiments of the people; and he hoped that the Government, amongst the many onerous duties which devolved upon them, might find some opportunity of giving their attention to that question. If the Government were now to make some promise to deal with the subject, he presumed that the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) would not, in face of such an assurance, persevere in pressing on his Bill. But if there were no hope of the Government doing anything in the matter, then he, for one, hoped that the Bill, though a small and piecemeal measure, would be accepted by the House as a step in the right direction.

MR. ROBERTS cordially supported the Bill, believing that it offered a simple remedy for an evil—the power Aldermen now had of electing their fellow Aldermen, irrespective of and often contrary to the feelings and opinions of the majority of the elected members of the Corporation. As a citizen of Liverpool he had many years' experience of the system working adversely to the interests of the Liberal Party; but he believed that there were many places where the proposed change would be of advantage to the Conservatives; and he was confirmed in this belief by the action of some hon. Members on his own side, and the absence of opposition to the measure by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Bill would cut both ways, so that they were able to regard it as a matter of principle, irrespective of Party consideration. He objected to the present mode of electing Aldermen in England, mainly because under it municipal bodies could, and often did, represent the opinions, not of the present electors, but those of electors of three, six, and more years previously. Imagine such a system applied to our Parliamentary representation. Suppose that the majority of the Members of that House had the privilege of electing one-fourth of its Members, and that half of the number so elected had the privilege at every General Election of voting for successors. The result would be that if the Liberal majority at the last election had been 80, instead of twice that number, the country would now be governed in accordance with the result of the Election of 1874, and not that of 1880. Such a state of things would, of course, be impossible, because unendurable; and the same principle was as unfair, though not as important perhaps, in the election of Municipal Corporations. He asked the House to pass this Bill, not merely to remedy the special grievances which had been referred to, but in recognition of the principle that municipal government, like Parliamentary, should be representative, and that this Bill would make it more directly such.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was of opinion that no case had been made out in support of the Bill. Any stranger hearing the debate would imagine that Town Councils were elected only for political purposes. But Town Councils were elected for attending to the lighting, paving, and other duties important to towns. When Aldermen were appointed—he regretted sometimes for political reasons—they were elected by those who had been chosen by the ratepayers. There was this advantage in having Aldermen on a Corporation: they acted as a continuity of the line of business or policy adopted by a Corporation; and thus, if a great change occurred in the constitution of a Corporation, the Aldermen were able to continue the thread of the municipal business. Now, he thought it would be generally admitted that the present system had worked very well. It was for the burgesses to return whom they liked to the Town Council, and in the end the burgesses generally had their own way. The case of Colchester had been quoted, where there were three Aldermen; and one of them would, of course, have the power of giving the casting vote. But then the burgesses would ultimately have the right of expressing their opinion. He would ask the hon. Member, under all the circumstances, to let well alone. Some people said that this was all that was wanted; but his opinion was that there should be no change in the law, unless the Government thought fit to take up the subject, and he submitted that no case had been made out for a change in the law.

MR. WILLIAMSON, as a citizen of Liverpool, said, that if they allowed the present system to continue, it would not be a case of letting well alone. The present system of electing Aldermen was a relic of the old rotten borough system, and he hoped it would be reformed by the passing of this Bill. He did not object to a small body of experienced men having the distinction of Aldermen; but this distinction ought not to be given by a majority, only obtained by the voices of other Aldermen. He agreed with the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Stanley) that the Town Councils ought to repre-

extended. In 1875, in the English Act, the notice was increased from six months to one year; and in 1876 it was increased in Ireland to the same period. If the law had been so altered in these countries in the case of yearly tenants, it was not too much, he thought, to ask that the Scotch law should be altered to two years' notice in the case of 19 years' leases. There was another part of the Scotch system which he would like to allude to. It was, that when a lease expired at the end of 19 years, or the period decided upon, if there was no arrangement between the landlord and tenant, and no notice, what the Scotch called tacit relocation took place, and this entitled the tenant to remain for another year, and so he went on from year to year, without any written engagement. It entitled the tenant to one year more of possession of his holding. If this Bill passed into law, it would be very popular, especially in view of the Bill which, he supposed, would also be carried this Session in regard to certain wild animals. The effect would be that when the leases expired tenants would be allowed to remain under the system of tacit relocation from year to year, and they would have a right to have two years' notice. A very important point in the system of two years' notice was this—that it would settle the question of unexhausted manures to a great extent. By a short clause in the English Agricultural Holdings Act, it was provided that compensation should be given to tenants for unexhausted manures put in within two years of the termination of their leases, in order that they might not lose the value of the money invested in manure, and yet that the land might be cultivated up to the highest point to the very end of the lease. It might happen in Scotland, under the existing law, that a man might remain for 18 years and 325 days upon a holding, and might manure it properly, expending money upon it up to the very last year; and yet the landlord might come to him and say—“You will go in 40 days, and I will have all the benefit of your manure.” That was a very hard case, and it was provided for, in so far as England was concerned, in the English Act, and it would have been in the Scotch Act if the Agricultural Holdings Act for Scotland had been pressed on; but the late

Government withdrew the Bill the same year as it was introduced, so that in Scotland they had not that provision. Scotch farmers did not yet enjoy the presumption of law enjoyed by the English farmers. By the action of relocation, a farmer might be allowed, after his lease expired, to continue his occupancy of his farm without the security of any written document, being content to remain on the same footing as before. That was a very satisfactory thing to see, because it showed that the tenant and the landlord were on a footing of confidence. He would just read a short paragraph from Lord Stair's Institutes as to the meaning of tacit relocation:—

Well, he had put in the Bill that a notice should be given not less than two years, and not more than three years, and the object of that was that the tenant should not receive notice at the commencement of his long lease of 19 years, and then hear nothing of it until two years before his lease terminated. It had always been thought that notice should be within a reasonable time; and in an Act of Parliament in 1676, or some such date, it was provided that warning should be given not more than three years, and when they considered that a landlord had a tenant under his observation for 17 years, it was surely no hardship to ask him to make up his mind whether he would keep his tenant or not, and it was due to the tenant he should know what his prospects in life might be. If the landlord was undecided he only had to give his tenant notice that he would have to go, and the landlord thus would save himself from any inconvenience; but it did not follow that he needed to act upon that warning—he might let the tenant remain if he liked when the lease expired. He thought it was for the interest of landlords as well as of tenants that such a Bill as this should become law. It would be to the interest of the landlord to have his land fully cultivated up to the end of one lease and the commencement of another. The incoming tenant, on the other hand, would find the land manured to a greater extent than was now the case. It would be to the interest of the State

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) (NOTICE OF REMOVAL) BILL.

(Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. Mc Lagan, Mr. Barclay.)

[BILL 141.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving, that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was twofold. The first object was to provide for the continued cultivation of land up to the fullest power of production that was possible, instead of allowing it to fall into a low condition at the end of an old lease and the beginning of a new one; and the second object was to provide security to a tenant that he should receive at the end of his lease compensation for his unexhausted manures. The one was the interest of the State, and the other was the interest of the tenant. It was the interest of the State that the land should always be fully cultivated, and it was the interest of the tenant that he should fully get back the value of the money he expended. He would like to explain that the system of tenure was very different in Scotland from what it was in England. In the majority of cases in England, yearly tenancies were the rule, and leases were the exception. In Scotland it was the reverse. It was usual there for the land to be occupied under leases, yearly tenancies being exceptional. Leases in Scotland generally ran for 19 years; and the law, as it now stood, made him only receive 40 days' notice before the termination of his lease, so that a farmer might remain 18 years and 325 days in his holding, as he believed to the satisfaction of his landlord, and then have only 40 days' notice to clear out of his farm, in which he might have invested thousands of pounds, and might provide himself with a farm, if he could, elsewhere. That was a state of things that the Bill was intended to remedy. The law of England and Ireland required that no less than a year's notice should be given even in cases of yearly tenancies. Even where farmers only held from year to year, they were entitled to a year's notice, unless they had contracted themselves out of this rule on their own accord by making another arrangement. When it was considered that in Scotland they had only 40 days' notice, even in cases of leases of 19 years, he thought the alteration proposed by the Bill would commend itself to the House. The law of 40 days' notice had been in force for 325 years. It was enacted in the time of Queen Mary of Scotland in the year 1555. It was then thought a very judicious and humane measure. The previous custom was described by Erskine, in his Institutes, as an injurious and barbarous custom, for all that required to be done was to break a wand at a tenant's door as a notice to quit. It was then also provided that the 40 days' notice should be 40 days' before the Whit Sunday of the year of the termination of the lease, so that whenever the lease expired in Martinmas—11th November—as the tenant had his notice 40 days before the 15th of May—the legal Whit Sunday in Scotland—that gave him more than six months' notice. If the lease terminated on a Whit Sunday, the tenant must have a year and 40 days' notice, because the law required that notice must be given before the Whit Sunday preceding what they called the "ish" or exit of the lease, so that in some cases the tenant might have a year and 40 days' notice. That system of giving 40 days' notice before Whit Sunday existed from 1555 till 1853, when a Bill was brought into Parliament and passed into an Act, which provided that the 40 days' notice should apply to any date. It took away the provision that the notice must be given before the preceding Whit Sunday. That was a great loss to the tenants of Scotland, because it took away six months at least of the period notice hitherto given to the tenant; and, strange to say, the Act which contained that little clause was an Act passed ostensibly to facilitate the procedure before the Sheriff Courts. He found that there was not a single word said in either House of Parliament on the subject of this clause, which was of such great importance to the farmers of Scotland. When such a measure was passed in 1853, without eliciting the slightest observation, it was not unjust to say that it passed without sufficient consideration of its importance. Now, although, as he had shown, the law in Scotland had been altered in what he called a retrograde manner on behalf of the tenants by allowing simply the 40 days' notice, in England and Ireland only recently the period of notice had been extended. In 1875, in the English Act, the notice was increased from six months to one year; and in 1876 it was increased in Ireland to the same period. If the law had been so altered in these countries in the case of yearly tenants, it was not too much, he thought, to ask that the Scotch law should be altered to two years' notice in the case of 19 years' leases. There was another part of the Scotch system which he would like to allude to. It was, that when a lease expired at the end of 19 years, or the period decided upon, if there was no arrangement between the landlord and tenant, and no notice, what the Scotch called tacit relocation took place, and this entitled the tenant to remain for another year, and so he went on from year to year, without any written engagement. It entitled the tenant to one year more of possession of his holding. If this Bill passed into law, it would be very popular, especially in view of the Bill which, he supposed, would also be carried this Session in regard to certain wild animals. The effect would be that when the leases expired tenants would be allowed to remain under the system of tacit relocation from year to year, and they would have a right to have two years' notice. A very important point in the system of two years' notice was this—that it would settle the question of unexhausted manures to a great extent. By a short clause in the English Agricultural Holdings Act, it was provided that compensation should be given to tenants for unexhausted manures put in within two years of the termination of their leases, in order that they might not lose the value of the money invested in manure, and yet that the land might be cultivated up to the highest point to the very end of the lease. It might happen in Scotland, under the existing law, that a man might remain for 18 years and 325 days upon a holding, and might manure it properly, expending money upon it up to the very last year; and yet the landlord might come to him and say—“You will go in 40 days, and I will have all the benefit of your manure.” That was a very hard case, and it was provided for, in so far as England was concerned, in the English Act, and it would have been in the Scotch Act if the Agricultural Holdings Act for Scotland had been pressed on; but the late

Government withdrew the Bill the same year as it was introduced, so that in Scotland they had not that provision. Scotch farmers did not yet enjoy the presumption of law enjoyed by the English farmers. By the action of relocation, a farmer might be allowed, after his lease expired, to continue his occupancy of his farm without the security of any written document, being content to remain on the same footing as before. That was a very satisfactory thing to see, because it showed that the tenant and the landlord were on a footing of confidence. He would just read a short paragraph from Lord Stair's Institutes as to the meaning of tacit relocation :—

Well, he had put in the Bill that a notice should be given not less than two years, and not more than three years, and the object of that was that the tenant should not receive notice at the commencement of his long lease of 19 years, and then hear nothing of it until two years before his lease terminated. It had always been thought that notice should be within a reasonable time; and in an Act of Parliament in 1676, or some such date, it was provided that warning should be given not more than three years, and when they considered that a landlord had a tenant under his observation for 17 years, it was surely no hardship to ask him to make up his mind whether he would keep his tenant or not, and it was due to the tenant he should know what his prospects in life might be. If the landlord was undecided he only had to give his tenant notice that he would have to go, and the landlord thus would save himself from any inconvenience; but it did not follow that he needed to act upon that warning—he might let the tenant remain if he liked when the lease expired. He thought it was for the interest of landlords as well as of tenants that such a Bill as this should become law. It would be to the interest of the landlord to have his land fully cultivated up to the end of one lease and the commencement of another. The incoming tenant, on the other hand, would find the land manured to a greater extent than was now the case. It would be to the interest of the State that that should be the case, for more food would be produced for consumption, and more content would be spread amongst the occupiers of land, as there would be more time allowed them to make their arrangements. Though he did not go the length of many Members in regard to the land, yet he thought it was perfectly right that the State should control the action of landlords in this country. They occupied the land for the beneficial interest of the public; and if their arrangements were not such as were conducive to the public benefit, he thought the State had a perfect right to step in and say, to a certain extent, what they should do. Large tracts of land were now going out of cultivation, and there was no question that the State had a right to step in and prevent this waste of food-producing power. The provision he was asking the House to adopt had reference to no hypothetical case. What he desired had actually been given on some properties, where it was found to be of very great advantage. He had here an extract from a lease on a large property with which he was acquainted—

"I (so-and-so) bind myself and my successors to give two years' notice before the termination of this lease to the tenant thereof, whether said lease is to be renewed to him, and if so, on what conditions."

That clause in the lease was found to be a very satisfactory clause, both to landlord and tenant. The tenant felt a security in all that he did, and the landlord gave up no control whatever over his property. His agent and factor had only to say two years before the expiry of a lease that it was to be terminated, if the landlord wished to get rid of his tenant. This cost nothing, and was giving away nothing when they had a long lease. He rather thought that English Members who were not acquainted with the working of the long-lease system in Scotland were afraid of granting the right to two years' notice; and certainly, when compared with 40 days' notice, it was a great jump to make. But when they considered that in England a year's notice was given in the case of a year's tenancy, two years' notice was worth nothing more than a Scotch farmer was entitled to with his long lease. He hoped the Government would assent to the principle of the Bill, because it really only went on the lines which Members of the present Government had so often announced on the hustings their approval of. The Bill assented to the same principle as the Government had announced their intention of embodying in the measure they were going to undertake next Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

Mr. RAMSAY said, it was with great reluctance that he rose to address the House on this occasion. The laudable object of the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was to secure compensation to tenants who had used artificial manure in the cultivation of their land. But, in his (Mr. Ramsay's) opinion, the Bill would have very different results from those which the hon. and gallant Member expected would be derived from it. The hon. and gallant Member had said that the most of the land in Scotland was held under leases, while leases were exceptional in England. What he (Mr. Ramsay) deprecated as one of the probable results of this measure was that the landlords in Scotland would be compelled, as in England, to do without leases. He deprecated any interference by piecemeal legislation between landlord and tenant. If the State was going to interfere—and he did not dispute the proposition that the State had a right to interfere when the people of the country were prejudiced by existing law—indeed, it was well known that it did interfere in such cases, with or without compensation, as the circumstances required. He should rather see the views of the late Mr. Mill carried out, and that the State should take over the land, give compensation to the owners, and farm it itself, or let it to such farmers as it pleased, than see the relations of landlord and tenant disturbed in every succeeding Session of Parliament by measures such as the present Bill. The tenants were quite able to take care of themselves. His hon. Friend assumed that the tenants were unable to take care of themselves, and complained that the land might not be cultivated during the last two years unless his Bill was passed. But he (Mr. Ramsay) saw another probable result of passing it. The landlord might give the two years' notice saying—"I have given the statutory notice; if you do not think of leaving, it will be open to you to arrange with me before it expires." In such a case the two years' notice would be of no use to the tenant. He would be in doubt whether the notice would be put in force or not. It would be better to continue the 40 days' notice, with the distinct arrangement embodied in such lease that the tenant should quit at the end of the expressed term of years without any notice at all. Their leases contained a notice to remove at the end of the lease, with or without notice. But in addition to the 19 years' notice to quit, expressed and agreed on in the lease, the law said he should get 40 days' notice, immediately prior to the stipulated term of removal, and that if he did not get it, he should be entitled to remain in possession under tacit relocation, which was equivalent to saying that the tenant sat on from year to year on the same terms as he had previously held the land under the lease. It would be all very well to legislate in this fashion if the whole of the land of Scotland were arable land under cultivation. But it was less than one-fifth of the area of Scotland which was under cultivation; and such a sweeping measure as this would disturb the relations of landlord and tenant where there was no need of such change, as might be needed in the case of arable land. Farmers on arable land and farmers generally in Scotland were quite able to judge of the nature of a bargain. He had had experience of a large number of tenants, and over a wide area, and he found them quite as well able to take care of themselves as the landlords. He did not see on what grounds the House should be asked to sanction the second reading of a measure of this kind, without there being any sufficient reason shown that the State had such an interest in the question as should constrain it to legislate in the way proposed by this Bill. He trusted that the Government would be pleased to intimate that they had resolved to take up the whole subject of the relations of landlord and tenant, and adjust them in a comprehensive fashion, not allowing them to be disturbed annually by measures such as the present, and such as had been previously brought before the House.

MR. ORR EWING said, he was very sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) looked upon the Bill as such a violent and sweeping measure. He was surprised to hear his hon. Friend say that he would rather see the land in the hands of the State than this Bill passed. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) thought it was a just and reasonable measure in the interests of landlords as well as in the interests of the tenants. Agents or factors generally began to deal with the tenants long before the end of their leases. They generally gave the tenants to understand whether or not they were to go on before its termination. But there were landlords and landlords in Scotland, just as there were farmers and farmers in Ireland. Under the law as it at present stood, a man might have been 19 years on a farm, and, perhaps, have spoken to the factor about his lease being renewed. There might have been an understanding, though actually no bargain, that it should be renewed; but something might, ere the old lease actually expired, take place between the farmer and the factor which would result in the farmer getting the 40 days' notice to quit. The farmer might be obliged to leave his farm without having dealt with the land as he would have done had he known he was to leave, and no compensation was allowed to him. If that Bill were passed, such a thing as that could not take place. Could it be said that 40 days were sufficient for a tenant farmer—perhaps a very large tenant farmer—to look out for another farm in which he could locate himself? It was impossible to get a farm at 40 days' notice, and farmers would, consequently, be put to great loss. His opinion was that that Bill would be a very judicious settlement of the question. It would improve the cultivation of the land, because they knew that where there was no arrangement made between landlord and tenant, the latter exhausted the land at the end of his lease by putting in white crops to a great extent and putting in no manure, and the incoming new tenant found the land was very inferior to what it should be. He did hope that this measure would meet with the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government, for he thought it was a reasonable and just measure for the tenant farmers as well as the landlords.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was glad that the hon. Member who had just sat down had so completely and fully answered the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay), who had taken a rather extreme view of this Bill. The hon. Member did usually take an extreme view of the rights of landlords in regard to the holding of land. He (Mr. J. W. Barclay) thought this Bill was a step—he did not say a large one—in the right direction, and that was towards continuity in the occupation of the land which must accompany high cultivation. The necessity for the landlord, or more probably his agent, giving two years' notice before their relations could come to an end, would be a strong warning to landlords and farmers that they should then endeavour to agree upon the provisions of a new bargain. Under the present arrangement, an agent neglectful of his landlord's interests might put off from one day to another giving the farmer any clear idea whether he wished him to go or stay; and the consequence was that the farmer would, during the last two or three years of his lease, put no money into the land which he could avoid doing. He would try, on the contrary, to get as much out of the farm as he could. Such a practice was neither advantageous to the farmer, the landlord, nor the public at large. It might be said that the proposal was an interference with the freedom of contract; but the provision as it now existed of 40 days' notice was a decided interference with the freedom of contract. ["No, no!"] He thought he was justified in so calling it. The landlord stipulated in the lease that the tenant was to quit the farm without any notice whatever, and if that notice were not given, then the tenant had a right to stay on for another year; but if the law overruled that express contract in the lease, as was the case, and said that a tenant was not bound to leave if he had not 40 days' notice, that appeared to him as explicit a case of interference with the freedom of contract as it was possible to have, and it might be some consolation to the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) to know that it had existed for 325 years without the Constitution of this country being seriously damaged in consequence. So far as this question of interference with contract was concerned, it seemed to him that it was merely a question of expediency. Parliament did and ought of necessity to interfere with contracts, when it appeared to be a necessity, in the interest of both parties and of the public. He was not in the least afraid that landlords would have recourse to yearly holdings in Scotland. Leases for long periods had done far more for the landlords of Scotland than for the tenants. But for them the landlords would have been obliged to accept large reductions of rent at the present time. Under yearly leases, a large portion of the land in Scotland would go out of cultivation, as it could not be the interest of the tenant to cultivate it on such terms. It was said that the tenants were able to take care of themselves. He was not surprised that the landlords should bring forward this argument. The landlords might say that the tenants were able to take care of themselves; but did the facts substantiate this statement? There was no doubt of what the opinions of the farmers themselves were. They were of opinion that they could not take care of themselves in their bargains with the landlords. If the House would consider the conditions to which they had to submit—and the conditions of a bargain were about the best evidence that the public could get as to whether, in the case where it applied, the parties to it were on an equal footing—the House would see that these conditions were manifestly unjust and one-sided, and that the only conclusion that would be come to by a jury considering it would be that one of the parties was not in a position to take care of himself. He was prepared to contend that there was no class of people in this or any other country more independent in character than the farmers of Scotland. They had shown this at the recent Election; and the fact that even they had to submit to conditions manifestly unfair and one-sided was the strongest possible evidence of the great power and pressure they had to contend against in making their bargains. This Bill being a step in the right direction, he hoped it would have the support of Her Majesty's Government. Though it interfered with contracts, it only interfered in a slightly greater degree than the present law interfered. They were only extending a principle which had existed for 325 years, and the necessity of which was becoming more and more apparent as the cultivation of land became more and more developed.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had listened carefully to all the

speeches made on the subject, and he had failed to find that a single instance had been given of evil arising out of the present state of the law which would justify the Bill before the House. What did the Bill deal with? It did not deal with tenants below five acres, or with tenants at will. It had nothing to do with those two classes for whom, if at all, some protection was needed; but it proposed to deal with parties who voluntarily entered into engagements extending over a considerable time, in Scotland generally 19 years, and to provide against the contingency of the two parties not coming to an agreement as to the renewal of the lease within 40 days of the expiring time. He challenged his hon. Friend whose name was at the back of the Bill (Mr. J. W. Barclay), or any hon. Gentleman connected with Scotland who knew anything of the working of the lease system in Scotland, to produce to him any instance where a grievance had arisen out of the present state of the law. Judging from his own experience, the usual practice was that leases were entered into for 19 years with the full understanding that if they did not come to a further agreement before the expiration of the time first named the lease came to an end. That was the usual practice in his neighbourhood, and, he believed, everywhere. It was only common sense to expect that no prudent man would allow his lease to run out just on the chance of its being renewed, or on the chance of tacit relocation. The farmers generally wanted a renewal of the lease, and if they could not get it they left their farm and went away somewhere else. It might be that extreme cases did occur when negotiations went on sometimes up to the last moment; but he thought it was very exceptional, for in practical life he thought the tenants generally knew very well what they were about. What was the object of the Bill? What earthly benefit would it be to the tenant farmers? An hon. Gentleman below him had said that it would lead to the disuse of leases; but he did not believe that there would be a disposition on the part of the landlords and tenants of Scotland to part with leases, nor did he believe that would be the result of the Bill. But what he did think the result of the Bill would be was that the notice would be given two years before the end of the lease, and then there would be an agreement between the landlord and tenant, so that in reality the Bill would be an utter nullity. He believed that would be the result of the Bill; and unless some hon. Member connected with Scotland could get up and lay his finger upon a case which could show that there was great necessity for the proposed legislation, he was of opinion that the Bill ought not to go on; but if, as was stated by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), there was a necessity for the alteration of the law with respect to the 40 days' notice, then he would be quite ready to consider that subject.

Mr. BIDDELL said, he held two or three farms under leases; and certainly, unless a fresh arrangement was made, his term would expire at the end of the lease, the result of that being that instead of getting 40 days' notice, as the Scotch did, the English farmers did not have any notice. The usual practice was that a lease terminated when the time expired, unless it was renewed. At the same time, he was of opinion that the principle advocated by the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) was a right principle. He believed it would be mutually advantageous if the law compelled the party wishing to terminate an engagement to give, say, one year's notice. Two or three years he thought to be too long a notice. In the Chamber of Agriculture of which he was a member the subject had been discussed, and that body had come to the conclusion that it would be of mutual advantage if one year's notice was the rule. This would afford no more protection to the tenant than it would to the landlord. Landlords had, certainly, land thrown upon their hands when they did not expect it, and he thought the principle laid down in the Bill was a just one.

Mr. M'LAGAN said, an hon. Gentleman had challenged any Scotch Member to adduce cases where a grievance had been created by the existing law. He knew a case in his own neighbourhood where a landlord had let the land on the best terms possible. The tenant requested the landlord to renew the lease; but he declined to state what course he intended to take before the 40 days. It might be said that the landlord did not put the tenant out of the farm; but then he put him to great trouble and inconvenience in not knowing whether he was going to be allowed to remain or not, and it had often been found that farms were not easily to be obtained at 40 days' notice. It was not merely the question of compensation for unexhausted manures which the tenant had put in his holding; but it was necessary for the tenant to get a longer notice to quit in order to enable him to obtain another farm and a house in which to live; and on that ground alone he advocated the principle of the Bill before the House, and should support its second reading. He was very much surprised to hear the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) speak of the question as if it was such a great interference with the freedom of contract. He (Mr. M'Lagan) was as much opposed to interference with freedom of contract as anyone, and he agreed that any interference on the subject ought not to take place except under circumstances of public necessity; but in the case of the Bill before the House it was not introducing a new principle at all. They had the interference of the State existing already, in so far as legislation was concerned, as it was already provided that 40 days' notice must be given. That was provided in the event of the landlord and tenant coming to no terms whatever, and to prevent any dispute as to what time notice should be given; so it was said and laid down as a principle that it would be absolutely necessary to give 40 days' notice to render any dispute easily settled. It was not laid down that a landlord was compelled to give 40 days' notice. He might give one year or two years' notice if he chose; but in the event of any dispute between the landlord and the tenant the Legislature had laid it down as a matter of expediency that 40 days' notice must be given. The hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs had said that it would have been much better for the Legislature to take all the land into its own hands and deal with it altogether than to have the present interference. On that question he maintained that they were anticipating altogether a discussion which would take place on another Bill which was before Parliament, when the question of interference with the freedom of contract would come up. The question now before them was very clear. It was absolutely necessary that the tenant should know in time whether he was to keep his land or not, so that he might prepare for it either by manuring his farm heavily or by not manuring it so much, so as not to leave too much of his money in his land for those who might come after him. He knew of many cases where tenants were not told that they were to leave the farms, and the result was that they left a large amount of their capital behind them in the land; but, by giving two years' notice, they would be enabled to do that which was right and proper. He did not say that the landlords would be the losers by the proposal; but he thought that if the Bill passed into law the landlords would make agreements with the tenants that the farms should not be run out at the end of the lease. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in one of his election speeches, stated that he thought a good arrangement between landlord and tenant would be to allow the tenant to farm land according to the best rules of husbandry, and during the last four or five years of his lease to bind him down to a particular rotation. That was simply giving four or five years' notice to quit to the tenant. It would not be necessary to give that notice at all if the landlord wished to part with him. That was the method which many of the best proprietors of England were adopting in regard to the cultivation of the land. They allowed the tenants to farm the land as they thought proper until nearly the end of the lease, and then they bound them down as to the way in which the cultivation should be pursued. They had been told from the front Treasury Bench that a Bill which was lately introduced was simply carrying out a practice which good proprietors adopted in the country. He was now only asking the House to carry out the practice which every good proprietor in the country adopted. Such a one would take good care to give his tenant due notice whether he intended to part company with his tenant at the end of his lease. He did not think two years' notice was too much. On the contrary, he put in his own leases sometimes four or five years, so as to allow the tenant on a farm to bring it into a proper state when he was about to leave. That, he contended, would be better than the present system, where a landlord had only to give six weeks' notice to leave. He trusted the Government would support the measure. But, if not, he hoped they would give the House a promise that when they took up the question of reforming the Land Laws that the question they were discussing would be particularly considered, and that due notice should be given to tenants before they were compelled to leave their farms. If they got that assurance from the Government he should advise his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) not to put the House to the trouble of dividing; but if they did not get that assurance he should certainly advise him to take the sense of the House on the question.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he heartily wished a Scotch lawyer was present to deal with the question; but, under present circumstances, he would do his best. First, he must give every credit to the motives of his hon. and gallant Friend in bringing forward the Bill in the interests of the outgoing tenants, and to secure that what he thought due notice should be given him before the termination of the lease. He thought, however, that a strong expression of opinion had been given in that House that two years' notice was too long, and that to meet the circumstances of the case a much shorter notice would be necessary. But it appeared to him, as an individual, that the weak point in the Bill was this. Supposing he (Mr. Peel) were a proprietor, and he did not like the system of long leases, what, then, was to prevent him giving notice to his tenant as a matter of form, for the purpose of securing himself against probable loss? He should say to the tenant—"I am really not going to oust you at the termination of your lease; but I should like, in the meantime, to consult with you as to whether you can give me a sufficiency of rent, or equal to what another tenant will offer." In that case he did not precisely see how the tenant under the Bill would be in any different position to that which he was in under the existing law. It appeared to him that that was the weak point of the Bill. The suggestion had been thrown out that the Government should say that the subject was under consideration. All he could say was that the subject itself, as well as the question touched on in the Bill, and the question of the permanent improvement of the relations between landlord and tenant was one eminently deserving of consideration, and one which ought to form part of any scheme on the subject. As the Bill was drawn he did not think it exactly answered the purpose which was intended; and he hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not press it at the present time, but take the assurance that the subject he had raised, and the other matters put forward as to the position and relations of the out-going tenant, would be carefully considered by the Government when they came to consider the whole question of the Land Laws.

LORD ELCHO said, he had not known that this Bill was to be brought forward, and he had only seen it that day at the Bill office. From what he had heard he should say that the Bill was one of those Bills showing the tendency of the Legislature to interfere in every possible way with everyone in every relation of life. At one time it was between employers and employed, with reference to injuries; at another time it was with seamen and their wages; and at another time it was with landlords. At the present moment, in consequence of the agricultural distress, the Liberal Party were attempting to make political capital out of it. It was supposed that that Party had incurred a debt to those who returned them, and they were endeavouring to pay that debt by interfering in every way between landlord and tenant. He maintained that the legal and official astuteness of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made clear the defects of the Bill—that it would prove to be a nullity. But it was not a nullity in regard to the principle it embodied, of further interference with contract.. Anything like the reasoning of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, logically speaking, he had never heard. In fact, he (Lord Elcho) had, by way of experiment, drawn a fresh Preamble to the Bill. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had asked them to contrast the state of things in England, where there was only a yearly tenancy, with a year's notice, and the state of things in Scotland, with 40 days' notice, and then proceeded—"Is it possible, in a country where the farmer is in possession of an 18 years' lease, to be turned out at 40 days' notice, while in England the tenant with no such lease had a year's notice?"

Therefore, the Preamble ought to run thus—"Whereas in England, where the tenant has no other security than a yearly tenancy, and of a consequence a year's notice is made necessary at the termination, ergo be it enacted that in Scotland, where the tenant has a security of 19 years' lease, two years' notice shall be required." He thought the reasoning was rather the other way. The whole theory of leases in Scotland was based on the security of long leases such as 18 or 19 years, and in consequence of that they only gave 40 days' notice. But they had heard, in the course of that debate, from many hon. Gentlemen, that the tenants in England with respect to leases were in a very much worse position than the tenants in Scotland were, whether in regard to house or land tenancy. As regarded the practical grievance, however, he dared any of the Gentlemen whose names were on the back of the Bill to say that any real practical grievance had arisen under the present system, and that the practice generally, as had been stated, was not to give ample notice to the tenant, whether they were or were not entitled to it. Hon. Members seemed to forget that what they proposed was an interference on the part of the State. He maintained that the State had no right to interfere, and should not interfere in this fashion. It simply led to bad blood between landlords and tenants; and he agreed with the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs that if the State was going to deal with land in that way—following the precedent of the Irish Land Act, which overrode all contracts and confiscated property in every possible way without compensation—if it intended so to deal with land in this country, the sooner they knew of it the better, and the sooner the State acted honestly in this matter the better. The honest way of dealing, as was suggested by the Member for the Falkirk Burghs, was that the State should say—"We think that the present system of Land Laws is in the interests of the country unsound, and the property on land ought not to be held by individuals. The State can do these things far better than individuals can; and, therefore, we will take the land and compensate them who hold it for the full value." That was a more rational and honest plan of dealing with this question than for Members who had pledged themselves to their constituencies or to their Party coming to that House with perpetual Land Bills—not that it had been done on this occasion—and, thinking they had a majority on their side, giving in to such wrongful principles of legislation. As regarded the questions of entail, settlement, and cognate subjects, he could understand them being placed under the heading of land legislation. But the present proposal was a distinct matter. Scotland had been brought from a barren moor under a system of free contracts, and all this interference with contract would simply have the effect of making men very careful how they gave these contracts and leases. As for himself, he would rather have his property at a less rent free from these trying, hampering agreements made by the State, than with a nominally larger rent under State supervision and State hatching such as had grown up in Ireland. In Scotland he trusted they should remain free. He should have been perfectly prepared, if the Government had expressed approval of this Bill, to have resisted it; and he thought his hon. Friend opposite would have stood by him in resisting this unnecessary meddling and uncalled for interference for political purposes, in payment, he believed, of political debts incurred at the hustings. Happily, however, the course taken by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department removed from him the necessity of resisting the measure. He trusted that when the Government came to revise the Land Laws they would not think that that part of the subject required attention—namely, the relation between landlord and tenant, and that freedom of contract which in Scotland and in this country had produced beneficial results to all parties concerned.

Mr. LITTON said, that, as the Irish Land Act had been referred to, he might assure the House that the Irish Land Act had worked very well in Ireland, and he had no doubt but that its principles would find their way into Scotland before long. The principle of that Bill seemed to be a very reasonable one, and its object was to extend the 40 days' notice now given to a two years' notice. It was not fair to allow a man to remain in uncertainty up to almost the last day of his lease, because he might have an opportunity of taking another farm elsewhere if he knew in time what the landlord intended to do. In Ireland it was not unusual to find a man in occupation of land before the lease was drawn up, and the tenant would expect to remain in occupation at the expiration of the lease. It was extremely desirable that the tenant should have sufficient notice as to whether he was to remain or not at the expiration of the lease. In his opinion, a two years' notice prior to the expiration of the lease would be a favourable compromise. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) called the provisions of the Irish Land Bill confiscation.

LORD ELCHO said, that what he meant by confiscation had reference to disturbance—to what was described by the late Sir John Gray as the taking of £8,000,000 from the pockets of one class in order to put it into the pockets of another.

MR. LITTON said, he accepted the explanation of the noble Lord; but if the question of confiscation was to be raised he would be quite prepared to show there was no confiscation. The noble Lord had said that there was in the present Bill an interference with private contract; but he must be aware that, in order to maintain a contract, the parties must stand on an equal basis, and unless the two sides were perfectly independent and free it could not be said that contract was interfered with. In Scotland it might be that the tenant came to his landlord on equal terms. If that were so, he should be inclined to agree with the noble Lord that it was objectionable to interfere with contracts. On the other hand, if the man in possession had to accept a contract under the penalty of removal, or of not obtaining the terms which he would have a fair right to expect, then he should say there was no interference with the contract.

MR. MARK STEWART said, the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), in his opinion, dealt with a very useful subject; but although he agreed with the principle expressed he did not think it applicable to that Bill. At the present time there were many tenants who did not care to take a lease, and it was not wise on the part of many landlords to ask their tenants to take a lease, but rather, owing to the depression, to let them remain on from year to year. Suppose the Bill were carried, a simple notice of termination of leases would be given, not necessarily binding on the part of the landlord or the tenant. What would be the use of burdening the Statute Book with Bills which would only confuse instead of guiding those who were anxious to take the fair view which the law laid down on those questions. If his hon. and gallant Friend accepted the views of the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department he would do well. He had listened to the debate, and as much opposition had been shown on the Ministerial side as on that of the Opposition. This opposition was not necessarily to the principle of the Bill, because if they came to what amount of notice should be given more than two years were required. In his own part of the country five years were required, if they expected a man to farm as high as was customary; and therefore, as far as this went, two years would not be one whit better than one year. He was quite certain that the more impediments they put to freedom of contract between landlord and tenant, the greater difficulty one had with tenants. He hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not press the matter to a division, for if he did he was afraid he should have to vote against him—not because he did not agree with the principle that 40 days was too short a period, but because he thought the provisions of the Bill were unnecessary, and, besides, such matters were far better left to the good feeling subsisting between landlord and tenant than to any Act of Parliament.

MR. GREGORY said, he could not see on what principle the law of Scotland required notice of 40 days. It would be much better that it should be understood that the tenancy should terminate upon the expiration of the lease as it did in England.

MR. PARKER said, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had informed the House that he was not aware of the existence of the present Bill till he came down to the House that morning. Had he read it more carefully he might not have found it necessary to say so much about confiscation under the Irish Land Act, and interference with freedom of contract. The Bill did not propose to interfere with freedom of contract. But then, said the noble Lord, it was open to other objections. Notices might be served as a matter of form two years beforehand, leaving the landlord to do as he liked till the last. Well, no doubt, landlords would have a perfect right to do so; and, therefore, he did not attach very much importance to the passing of the Bill. There was one ground, however, on which he would support the Bill. If the law prescribed a term of notice at all it was well that it should correspond to the practice of the best landlords. But the present notice as to renewal had been enacted 300 years ago, when 40 days' notice, no doubt, might be sufficient, considering the method of agriculture in vogue at that time. Now, however, there was a totally different system of agriculture, and it was generally recognized as important that tenants under leases such as prevail in Scotland, and under a system of high farming, should have at least two years' notice as to the renewal of the lease. The Representative of an English agricultural constituency had told them that two years was too long a notice. That, of course, might be debated in Committee; but he thought Scotch Members would be prepared to show that if a time were to be named at all two years were not too much. Where there was uncertainty as to the renewal of a lease, the land was often allowed to fall off in condition, and several years were necessary before it could be brought back to its former state if the renewal was obtained. On that ground he thought it worth while that some such enactment should be placed on the Statute Book as an indication to landlords of the term of notice that tenants might fairly expect. If his hon. and gallant Friend thought it necessary to go to a division he should vote with him; but after the consideration which the Government had promised to the subject he did not think a division was required.

MR. HICKS asked why this Bill stopped short at large farms, and was not extended to holdings of less than five acres in size? He indicated his opinion that great dangers would be incurred in way of interference with freedom of contract.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in reply, said, that a great deal had been said as to the alteration in the law his Bill proposed to effect. He could only say that the law as it stood, declaring as it did 40 days to be held the legal notice, was an interference with contract. It had been stated that the Bill had been brought in for political purposes. It was very easy to insinuate a motive, because no man could tell another man's motives. He thought, indeed, he had quite as much right to say that the opposition of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) was due to private interests, as the noble Lord had to say that his action was prompted by political purposes. As to what had been said by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department about formal notices, he would explain that if such notice were given the land would go out of cultivation. It was the object of the Bill to prevent the tenant receiving formal notice. The landlord who gave a formal notice would thus lose the interest he had in the land; and, therefore, no landlord would give such notice unless he intended to act upon it. He had no wish to put the House to the trouble of a division after the assurance of the Government that they would take the question into careful consideration, and that the result of that consideration would be embodied in a Bill next year. He had not altered his opinion as to the value of the measure in the least degree, although he now consented to withdraw it.

GUN LICENCE ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 193.]

(Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. Pell, Mr. M^cLagan, Mr. Mark Stewart.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to remove a grievance caused by the Act of 1870, by which a tax was imposed on the guns of those engaged in agriculture. Up to that period occupiers of land in Scotland and Ireland had been free to destroy hares and rabbits, and birds that preyed upon their crops without being taxed; but in that year a proposal was made to alter the game certificates, and a gun licence was imposed on all persons who carried a gun for the killing of these animals. A person might carry a gun and use it for frightening birds or for killing vermin; but if the person killed the birds instead of frightening them he had to pay a tax of 10s. for his gun. Farmers considered this a great grievance. The amount of the tax was not large; but they objected to it on principle. Parliament had not taxed a man's plough or his spade, and a gun was as necessary a tool to the farmer as either the plough or spade. They had no business to tax it any more than any other instrument of husbandry. He believed that if the Government were to remove the gun licence they would increase rather than diminish the Revenue, because many persons took out a gun licence not only because it enabled them to frighten and kill birds, but because under cover of it they killed game and other animals. They thus avoided taking out a game certificate, for which they would have had to pay £3, and so by only taking out a gun licence they saved £2 10s. If they would look at the number of game licences issued this year they would find it was 54,726, from which the Revenue derived £188,980. Gun licences had been issued to the number of 136,257, which brought to the Revenue a sum of £80,701. If they turned to the Returns of the Inland Revenue, they would find that every successive year there were some remarks made upon this point on the evasion of the game certificates by persons who took out gun licences. The Report of this year, for instance, said—

"The increase of game licences since 1871, when the gun licence was imposed, has only been one-fortieth of the total number; but the increase of the gun licence for the same period has been one-third of the total number."

And they went on to say—

"One reasonable inference to be drawn from these facts is that a larger number of persons who wish to shoot game take out only a gun licence, under which they carry their guns about without molestation of the Excise officers or gamekeepers, and accept the risk of being found killing game."

Another year they reported—

"It is impossible to believe that the large number of persons who go out to shoot game take out game licences. Many of them take no more than a gun licence."

It would therefore be seen that if they were to abolish the gun tax the Revenue would lose nothing, because many persons would be driven to take out a game certificate who now evaded it. Last year this question was brought before the House, and he had hoped that the Government would assent to the principles of the Bill; but it was talked out on that occasion. The chief objector to the Bill on behalf of the late Government was the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. James Lowther, whose memory was blessed by every Irishman. He said, on behalf of the Government, that he could not sanction the Bill, because it would be dangerous to allow Irishmen in Ireland to carry guns, and he would not take upon himself the responsibility of allowing the occupier of land there to have them. So little had that gentleman considered or cared about the subject that he did not know that the gun licence did not prevent a single person keeping a gun in his possession. Every man could have a gun in his house without paying a tax, and he might use it for any purpose he liked other than those he mentioned. It was not until he took it out to shoot birds that he became liable to pay the tax. The Excise officer might see him carrying a gun, but could not touch him if he said his only purpose was to frighten birds. It was only when the Excise officer caught him killing the birds that he forced him to pay the tax. The object of the Bill was to force occupiers of land to protect their crops from injury without the tax; and he expected this year the Bill would receive a more favourable consideration on behalf of the Government than it had last, because they had before them a Bill to enable the tenants to protect their crops from hares and rabbits. This Bill was proposed, therefore, on the same lines as that Bill, and it ought to receive the sanction of the Government. He thought he had shown the tax ought to be removed. In his part of the country they called it a Game Law in disguise, which, in point of fact, it was.

Motion made, and Question proposed; "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

MR. SEXTON thought it was desirable that occupiers of land should be able to protect their crops without being taxed; but he was not willing that any Bill should pass which would benefit the people of one portion of the United Kingdom at the expense of the people of another portion. The people of Ireland were now, by the expiration of the Peace Preservation Act, placed in an equal condition with the people of England and Scotland with regard to the carrying of arms; and with the view of preventing that state of things being disturbed by the passing of this Bill he moved that it be read a second time that day three months. If he were assured that the Bill would not prejudice the rights of the people of Ireland as to carrying of arms he would be happy to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. ANDERSON said the hon. Member's speech had been in favour of abolishing the gun tax, and he pretty much agreed with him; he believed the gun tax to be unproductive and useless, and very often evaded. But the Bill was not for abolition by any means. The Bill provided only for exemption, and it proposed such exemptions on the ground that the gun was an agricultural implement. He had never heard a gun called an agricultural implement before. If the hon. and gallant Baronet could make out that the gun was an implement of that kind, perhaps there might be some reason for asking for this exemption; but he did not look upon the gun in that light, and, besides, he did not like exemptions. If there was to be a tax, let it be levied; if it was to be abolished, then let that be done. If the present Bill had been one to abolish the tax he should have supported it; but as it proposed to do no more than create an exemption he should oppose it.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He was afraid that in the present state of the finances of the country it would be inexpedient to pass the Bill. The amount of the licence was only 10s. Viewing the danger of all these exemptions, he thought it would be unwise to nibble at that question. If they dealt with it, let them do so in a comprehensive, and not in a piecemeal, manner.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, considerable ambiguity prevailed at present as to the law with regard to the right of scaring birds. A case had occurred in his own county in which the decision of one Court had been reversed by another—the decision of the local Court had been overturned by the Court of Quarter Sessions. The case to which he referred was this:—A farmer was prosecuted for killing wood-pigeons. He was told that he had a right to scare these birds, but not to kill them; but his reply was, that he could not scare them without killing them. The local Court, as he had said, decided to inflict a fine; but the farmer, on appeal to the Quarter Sessions sitting at Ayr, got it decided by a majority that scaring birds included killing them. The Board of Inland Revenue was not satisfied with this decision, and announced an intention of appealing to the Court of Session; but at the last moment they abandoned the case. The farmer, however, had spent a considerable sum in the meantime, and that sum with some trouble he had recovered from the late Government. He merely wished to point out the unsatisfactory state of the law. In his opinion, the farmer was quite right in saying that it was impossible to scare the birds without killing them. They did a great deal more harm than hares and rabbits; and he thought, therefore, the law ought to be placed in regard to them on a more satisfactory footing. He could not agree with what the hon. Member for Glasgow had said in reference to the gun tax. Before that tax was proposed, the highways used to be infested with men and boys shooting at birds; but since the Act was passed a very great improvement had been effected.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law), referring to the observations of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), said he was not aware that there was now any difference between the law in England and in Ireland as to the right of having or carrying arms.

MR. SEXTON said, in that case he should withdraw his Amendment.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON also intimated that in consequence of what the

MR. BIRLEY, in supporting the Motion, stated that he fully approved of the proposal that representatives of ratepayers should be associated with the magistrates in the issue or withdrawal of licences of public-houses. Such a scheme was in accordance with constitutional principles, and had been followed long ago in the constitution of the Courts Leet which controlled the ale-houses in feudal times. It was true that during the last 400 years such matters had been left under the direction of the magistracy alone, and he ventured to say that they had conducted the licensing system very well upon the whole. But it had become absolutely necessary to satisfy public opinion in regard to the perfectly reasonable desire that those who were so much interested in the issue or withdrawal of licences should have some share in the management of that which was now intrusted solely to the magistrates. That was the great and leading principle of the Bill which had been adopted by the Church of England Temperance Society, partly in deference to the opinions and views enunciated by the Convocations of the Provinces of Canterbury and York. There was a second part of the Bill which had not been mentioned, but which deserved some attention, for it sought to provide for a fund out of which compensation could be given for the withdrawal of licences in certain cases. He thought that would be found more practicable upon examination than it might appear to be at first, and he believed that the result would be to close many houses of a class which it was generally admitted ought not to exist. He would not detain the House by going into the many other questions of interest which were connected with this Bill; but he trusted the House would assent to the second reading.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. He wished to explain to the House the reason why he asked them to adopt this course. They had been told by the hon. Baronet who introduced the measure that already two very powerful associations were opposed to the Bill, that the licensed victuallers were opposed to it, and that it was equally opposed by the Good Templars. It was the custom to represent the licensed victuallers as the friends of intemperance. But they had no interest in being so. On the contrary, in the interest of their business, it was their policy to promote temperance; and he protested against the manner in which they were held up to opprobrium. Because he opposed this Bill he was not to be set down as an advocate of intemperance. There was no man a greater opponent of intemperance than himself, and what he said practised. He was neither a licensed victualler nor a Good Templar. Those whom he represented were all friends of temperance, although they were opposed to the use of coercion to keep men sober. Those, however, who were always meddling and interfering with the comforts of others were the real promoters of intemperance. The Bill was a slight upon, and an insult to, the magistracy of England. The question raised was whether the House had confidence in the magistrates, and whether they had done their duty in the past? ["No, no!"] The two hon. Members who cried "No!" might have no confidence in them; if so, they could not approve of the Bill. But the House had confidence in them, and so had the country. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) had admitted that the magistrates had exercised their functions with discretion and for the good of the public. If so, why were they to be checked by the association with them of elected ratepayers? The magistrates had the greatest interest in maintaining the moral and social well-being of the people, and were not likely to grant licences in any locality where public-house accommodation was not required. From their interviews, too, with their neighbours, they knew who were and who were not fit to be intrusted with such a privilege. They had hitherto exercised their jurisdiction with care and judgment; and therefore it was that he asked the House, by rejecting this Bill, to show that they had still confidence in the magistrates. If the House had not confidence in them, then it ought to do away with them. The House would show its want of confidence in them if it gave the local five assessors chosen out of the ratepayers, without saying whether those elected were to pay rates to the extent of 1s. or £100. The licensed victuallers and brewers were not to be elected; but did the House suppose that saving them from themselves and getting them on board when otherwise, owing to circumstances beyond their control, they would be likely to break their engagements. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to insert in his Bill relating to Merchant Seamen's Wages the provision which he had himself proposed, by which a seaman should no longer be exposed to imprisonment for neglecting to join his ship without the option of paying a fine; if the fine were not paid, then let there be imprisonment in default. Experience had taught that it was not an easy thing to deal with the question of discipline in the Merchant Navy. As a great many questions were coming on next year, it would be well to secure this year the boon he had suggested for merchant seamen; and it would not interfere with any further legislation on the subject.

MR. BURT said, that, after the assurance given by his right hon. Friend that he would deal with the subject next year, he begged leave to withdraw the Motion and the Bill. But he thought it would be a good thing if the right hon. Gentleman could embody in his Bill the principle suggested by the noble Lord.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LICENSING LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Birley.)

[BILL 183.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that within the last eight or nine years several attempts had been made to reform our Licensing Laws; but they had failed to supply a proper solution of the question. In 1871, and again in 1872, he and those who acted with him approached Lord Aberdare (then (Mr. Bruce) upon the subject. He proposed similar clauses in the Government Bill; but they met with opposition and were withdrawn. In again introducing the principle, he wished it to be understood that it in no way interfered with the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). On the contrary, while it was supposed to militate against his views, it actually enlarged the scope of his measure. While the Bill of the hon. Baronet aimed at nothing more than the prohibition of licensed houses in a neighbourhood without the consent of the ratepayers, this measure proceeded on the old lines, and would retain the magistrates, associated with five elected ratepayers, as the tribunal which should determine where and to whom licences should be granted. On the ground, then, that this Bill admitted the principle that the ratepayers should have a voice in the matter, it ought to receive the hon. Baronet's support. It emanated from a highly Conservative body, the Church of England Temperance Association, the same body which two years ago took special care of the inquiry into intemperance before a Committee of the House of Lords, and it was founded upon the recommendations of that Committee. Therefore, so far as the Conservative Members were concerned, the Bill ought to have their fullest support, unless as regarded those who were themselves engaged in the trade. It was unnecessary for him to say that the brewers, the licensed victuallers, and all who were so engaged were vehemently opposed to it. A body known as the Good Templars, great promoters of sobriety, were equally violent in their opposition to it. If, then, it was so thoroughly abused on both sides, the House might be sure there was some good in it. One set of persons blamed it because it went too far, and others because it did not go far enough, all which went to prove that it was a truly moderate measure. There was, no doubt, a strong feeling throughout the country that the ratepayers should have a local option in respect to the granting of licences, and he had in the Bill yielded to that feeling; but, at the same time, he thought it desirable to retain the jurisdiction of the magistrates. With this arrangement the control of the ratepayers would be still as complete as it would be under the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle. All, however, that he at present wanted was that the House should affirm the principle of the Bill, which introduced local option in a measure of Conservative reform.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Harcourt Johnstone.)

Viscount Sandon

MR. BIRLEY, in supporting the Motion, stated that he fully approved of the proposal that representatives of ratepayers should be associated with the magistrates in the issue or withdrawal of licences of public-houses. Such a scheme was in accordance with constitutional principles, and had been followed long ago in the constitution of the Courts Leet which controlled the ale-houses in feudal times. The licensed victuallers and brewers were not to be elected; but did the House suppose that the licensed victuallers would not take an active part in the election so as to secure the return of their own friends, so that there would be an agitation kept up all the year round? And if they succeeded, would not they be more anxious for the granting of licences than the magistrates were at present? The magistrates had no special inducements to grant licences. They were residents in the districts, and had due consideration for their families and neighbours; and it was an advantage that they were not dependent upon popular election, so that they were not unduly influenced by the popularity or unpopularity of granting or withholding a licence. He should not complain then that the trade was to be harassed; every trade was harassed, and every interest, every landed proprietor, and every country gentleman, by those hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were never happy unless they were harassing somebody. The hon. Member was still speaking, when——

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH).

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence, brought up, and read.

MR. WALPOLE: In moving. Sir, that this Report lie upon the Table, it may be convenient to the House to know that the proceedings of the Committee were somewhat complicated as well as the evidence, and that although the evidence is not very long, it will require probably some little time to complete. I do not think it will be completed before Friday morning; consequently, in case any action is taken on the Report of the Committee, it may be convenient for hon. Members to know how soon the proceedings of the Report will be in their hands. This will be either on Friday morning or Friday afternoon.

MR. LABOUCHERE: After what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, I beg leave to give Notice that I shall defer my Motion that Mr. Bradlaugh be allowed to Affirm until Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

TURKEY—THE OTTOMAN ASSEMBLIES.

MOTION FOR THE INSTRUCTIONS TO MR. GOSCHEN.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMP-BELL: My Lords, it may be useful to enumerate the circumstances which seem to justify the Notice I have given, to call attention to the revival of the Ottoman Assemblies in connection with the Special Embassy to Constantinople; and to move an humble Address to Her Majesty that a Copy of the Instructions to Mr. Goschen be laid upon the Table. Although a few days ago the present aspect of the Eastern Question was rather copiously discussed by Members of the House well qualified to handle it, not one alluded to this important chapter of the subject.
If a stranger had come into the House, and listened with avidity, as I did, to so many competent instructors, he would not have discovered that these Assemblies had existed, or that a grave event had dropped a curtain on their action.
The answer of the noble Earl the Leader of the House, towards the end of May, as it appeared to me, was little calculated to assure the House that the Special Embassy had been directed to revive them. In the meanwhile, two of the most recent and distinguished travellers from Constantinople—Sir William Gregory and Mr. Lawrence Oliphant—have borne witness in the public journals to the necessity of that line which I should urge your Lordships to insist upon. The language of Sir William Gregory is more remarkable on this account. He was known in the House of Commons not only as among the first of Irish debaters, but as a special patron of the non-conforming races in the Ottoman Dominion.
In this very letter, while he deprecates undue hostility to Russia, he maintains that these political Assemblies ought to be revived, however much that Power may oppose the consummation. On both points the expressions of Mr. Lawrence Oliphant are almost identical in substance.

My Lords, it might be a remedy to some misapprehensions to bring before the House a short narrative of the mode in which the Ottoman Assemblies were established, and of the destiny they suffered. If my version is erroneous, the noble Lords who spoke the other night may contradict it or correct it. Although no statement is more reckless than a statement too familiar in the House, that since the Crimean War there had been no improvement in the Ottoman Administration, it is certain that great abuses existed under Abdul Aziz, of which Christians and Mahometans were equally the victims. In 1875 Constantinople wore a melancholy aspect, which might recall the darkest sketches of St. Simon or of Tacitus, when they unfold the daily march of arbitrary power. Even before that time, among the first men of the Sublime Porte there was a firm conclusion that Assemblies of some kind were indispensable. Not only Midhat Pasha, well known to your Lordships from his exile in this country, but Khalil Cherif, once Ambassador at Paris and nephew of the former Khedive, Hussein Avni, who was afterwards assassinated, and others I might mention were impatient for this object. In the spring of 1876 the movement of the Softas brought about the downfall of the Grand Vizier and the deposition of the Sultan.
Arbitrary rule was overcome decidedly and bloodlessly. From that moment some kind of Constitution was inevitable.
Large masses do not enter into union and expose their lives to hazard, merely to change the person of the despot and put another individual at the head of the system they conspired to overthrow, after a long struggle with fear, with indolence, with loyalty, which must oppose themselves to such an enterprize. From that moment, therefore, some kind of Constitution was in embryo. There was nothing very tardy in the parturition.
The Sultan Abdul Aziz fell in the summer of 1876. At the close of that year the new Assemblies were established.
In the early months of 1877 their vigour was demonstrated. It only remains to see in what manner they were doomed to perish. When the Sublime Porte had gone through this remarkable transition, it is quite true that they were not prepared to acquiesce in the decisions of the Conference which General Ignatieff seemed to them to have originated. Their objections were elaborately, as many think unanswerably, stated. No rejoinder followed. A Russian Army crossed the Pruth in April 1877, avowedly to enforce the propositions which the Conference had settled. When that Army reached San Stefano, at the end of 1877, the Ottoman Assemblies were deliberating. They were closed by military fiat, and have never since been opened. A retrospect of this kind is the only mode of dealing with the fallacy that these institutions were extemporized for nothing except to parry the legitimate demand of virtuous negotiators.

My Lords, it may now be proper to remark upon the objects which demand a revival of the Assemblies overthrown, either in a form identic or amended. Although far from the gravest point, the question of the Greek Frontier bears upon the subject. The Sultan is placed in a dilemma, from which nothing but a co-ordinate Assembly can release him. The demand which certain Powers have addressed, or are preparing to address, to him is one to which no arbitrary Sovereign can lend himself. He is asked to give up territory for which he is accountable to 30,000,000 subjects, to Mahometan opinion, to succeeding generations. He is not asked to give it up as a mode of solving any European difficulty. He cannot guide his conscience by the principle of making sacrifices for the general tranquillity of nations. The aggrandizement of Greece may be a benefit to Greece; it may be even a benefit to Thessaly, or any region to be possibly annexed to the Hellenic Kingdom; but it involves no gain of any kind to Europe. The Sultan, therefore, cannot venture to initiate the course demanded of him. A Parliament, if it existed, might canvass it, and possibly indorse it. The responsibility would be diluted. The Head of the State would no longer find himself in the almost iniquitous dilemma of being forced to alienate exacting Powers, or else to place his Throne and life in jeopardy that he may satisfy and humour them.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

But there is something to which the House may, perhaps, attach more weight than the Greek Frontier. That question is not so grave as it appears, since, although it tends to rupture between the States concerned, the war may be averted by the greater forces on which either is dependent. All enlightened statesmen must be anxious to retard the disintegrating movement in the territory of the Sultan until they have arrived at novel combinations, which it is harder now than it has been at any former period to realize. We see the growth of that disintegrating movement in Albania. We see it on the Balkans. A Parliament in which every race may find a voice, and every discontent the opportunity of utterance, tends a good deal to the cohesion of an Empire so distracted. In Austria it has eminently been a manner of facilitating union. So much is it the case, that those regions which at given moments have effected separation—such as Bohemia and Galicia—have been inclined to avoid it and withdraw their Representatives. To establish at Constantinople a body privileged to speak upon and remedy disorders is an obvious method of assuaging the propensity to fly in all directions from the centre, which may surprise the world into hostilities.

But, if we may judge from what took place on Friday last, the same conclusion may be based upon a ground more interesting to your Lordships. The whole atmosphere of Western Europe is charged with the idea that certain Ottoman reforms are indispensable. Before 1877 the condition of the Empire was alarming. It is now materially graver. Taxation has become more necessary to impose—more difficult to levy. Large armies are unpaid, and thus reduced to the necessity of brigandage. Around Constantinople discipline can hardly be maintained in the interior of barracks. The inhabitants of Pera, where all the European Embassies are placed, appear to be unable to leave their houses after nightfall. The houses themselves are an imperfect refuge from the violence the war has left behind to prey upon the capital. So much may be inferred from local correspondence. Our own Blue Books are full of gloomy pictures, both in Europe and in Asia. It is seen that the new organization of East Roumelia has been utterly disastrous.

The oppression to which Mahometans are now exposed, without the slightest provocation, surpasses the atrocities which led to so much ferment in this country, but which, at least, were traced to insurrectionary movement. In Armenia no form of discontent or misgovernment is wanting. The functions of Baker Pasha and the gendarmerie are unhappily suspended. On all these subjects, Major Trotter, Consul Mitchell, Vice Consul Biliotti, are authoritative witnesses. Their evidence is crowned to-day, by a despatch from Sir Henry Layard of April 27th, which must be known already to considerable numbers. The result is, that Great Britain is impelled to use the language of remonstrance. In a despatch of May 6th, which your Lordships may have also seen to-day, the Foreign Office have employed it. Such language, however just, however good, in its intention, is entirely inadequate. We did not act as a defending, and have, therefore, little weight as an admonitory, Power, as it is only through defence that we have any title to admonish. Besides, as it appears to me, although the question may admit of being debated, you can only act on distant Provinces by acting on Constantinople. It is scarcely possible to form enlightened institutions at Bagdad, and leave unchecked venality at Stamboul. The only method is to limit arbitrary power, and with it arbitrary outlay. No doubt, the same conclusion may be based on larger and more speculative arguments. But the language of Sir Henry Layard, which the House has seen this morning, is so authoritative in favour of this measure that I will not pursue the subject as I might have done. It might only weaken the impression he has made upon your Lordships.

At the same time, it may be necessary to offer some reply to the objection pertinaciously resorted to and founded upon one despatch of the noble Marquess who presided lately at the Foreign Office (the Marquess of Salisbury). A few weeks ago, in answer to a Question, the noble Earl the Secretary of State thought proper to revive it. I once had occasion to remark that the despatch may be interpreted in a different way from that which has been usual. It would be easy to contend that, in the light of subsequent events, it may be wholly disregarded. The despatch is founded on conjecture, and could not have another basis, as it was written before the Assemblies had begun to operate. But the conjectures of the greatest minds are not an answer to experience and trial. The noble Marquess reasoned a priori. He could do nothing else. Sir Henry Layard, a short time after, reasoned upon evidence, and, reasoning on evidence, pronounced in favour of the system the noble Marquess is supposed to have disparaged. How is it that the noble Lords, who bow so readily to the impressions of the noble Marquess on what he did not see at work, defy the language of Sir Henry Layard, who was able to remark its tendency and character, and who in several despatches of 1877 became a witness of its benefit? It is not a question between two rival critics, which might be an invidious one. It is a question between the previous estimate of one mind, and the actual observation of another. But Sir Henry Layard was not alone in his conclusion. The Greek Patriarch endorsed it. After the Assemblies had been sitting, and when Russia crossed the Pruth, the Greek Patriarch diffused a solemn Manifesto—it is in our Blue Books—to protest against the march of the invader, to vindicate the Sultan, and to proclaim his strong appreciation of the Charter which had recently been granted. It is no reproach to the noble Marquess if his speculative judgment is outweighed by the experimental verdict of the Ambassador and Patriarch together. Indeed, the criticism of the noble Marquess may have been thoroughly well founded, so far as it showed that the new Assemblies would require a modifying process. All Constitutions are imperfect at their outset. The world, it would appear, is more successful in mechanical discovery than in political contrivance. The Parliament of Great Britain had to go through various developments, and was not matured by Simon de Montfort, who is popularly mentioned as its founder. The Prussian Chambers were erected on the basis of a provincial system, which had been the only check upon Monarchical ascendancy. Austria, emerging from an arbitrary government so recently as 1848, has gone through several organic changes before the present system was arrived at. According to the ordinary estimate, France has gone through 14 Constitutions between 1789 and that of M. Wallon, which is still enduring. Besides, although under the direction of Lord Palmerston, who was the author of that policy, Great Britain has advanced and multiplied Assemblies in the world, she has never yet presumed to dictate their form, to organize their attributes, or regulate the manner of electing them. Her aim has been confined to the encouragement of institutions by which arbitrary power would be limited and Ministerial responsibility created. It is now beyond all question that the Chambers initiated by the Sultan were tending to these desirable results.

It remains, however, to consider by what line of action can the Assemblies be set up again. It seems to me that Sir William Gregory and Mr. Lawrence Oliphant are justified in their impression that it is impossible for Russia to favour a revival of the system she has lately overthrown and previously discouraged. It would militate against her influence upon the Bosphorus. It would endanger the stability of the despotic régime she adheres to in her territory. It would render nugatory, to a great extent, the waste of armies and expenditure of millions, to say nothing of the formidable hazards by which the process was accompanied. It follows, that a Prime Minister who hugs himself in the idea—however conscientiously—of a European concert, in which Russia would preponderate, as an agency for dealing with the clouds and problems of the East, can hardly take a step towards the consummation I have pointed to. He is himself the obstacle to such a consummation being arrived at. It is partly upon that account I do not ask the House to adopt a Resolution in favour of the measure I have touched upon; but, with a view to make the situation more intelligible, and thus to guide ulterior proceedings, shall move an humble Address to Her Majesty that the Instructions to Mr. Goschen may be laid upon the Table.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of the Instructions to Mr. Goschen."—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

EARL GRANVILLE: A copy of the instructions to Mr. Goschen has already been presented to the House. I did so on Tuesday last, in accordance with the promise I gave that as soon as we learnt the Identical Note of the Powers had been presented to the Porte those instructions should be laid on your Lordships' Table. I do not know that I have anything to say on the statement just made by the noble Lord. It has frequently been my misfortune not to agree with him on the different stages of the Eastern Question; but I am glad on this occasion to have heard from him arguments in favour of the re-assembling of the Ottoman Parliament at Constantinople, because the instructions which we have given to Mr. Goschen are to use his best efforts towards the attainment of that object.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

INSTRUCTION IN AGRICULTURAL SCIENCE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY rose to call attention to the Sixth Report of the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, which recommends the establishment of

"Scholarships for the purpose of aiding the development of scientific culture and technical training in the manufacturing districts of the country," and to ask the Lord President of the Council, Whether he will consider the propriety of giving similar encouragement for instruction in agricultural science? The noble Marquess said, it appeared from the last Report of the Commissioners of 1851 that a very large sum of money belonging to the Commissioners was in their hands which they proposed to devote to certain purposes, and one of the purposes to which they proposed to devote it was to establish a number of Scholarships for the purpose of developing scientific culture and technical training in the manufacturing districts. He thought that out of the large sums of money belonging to the Commissioners—amounting, he believed, to more than £1,000,000—some might be devoted to the development of agricultural teaching as to the instruction of science in other branches of trade and manufactures. He asked the Lord President of the Council that Scholarships should be extended to the teachers and students of agriculture. The other Question he had to ask of the noble Lord was, Whether the Science and Art Department proposed to repeat this summer the course of instruction to teachers of agricultural science? A Question was asked last year with reference to the class formed by the Science and Art Department, which produced from the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) a statement showing the great increase in the number of students who came up year after year to pass a course of agricultural science. The statement made by the noble Duke was to the effect that a course of instruction in the principles of agriculture was being given to teachers of agricultural science at South Kensington. He believed he was rightly informed that those teachers were the first to whom any instruction had been given at South Kensington. He considered it of the utmost importance that such instruction should be given, for it was of no use having teachers in the agricultural districts unless they were able and capable of teaching the rudiments of agricultural science. It was rumoured that it was not intended to continue the instruction at South Kensington this year. If that was so, he could only assure the Lord President of the Council that it would cause very great disappointment in the rural districts. There was no use having an agricultural class in rural districts without having a qualified teacher. He understood that the number of teachers who desired to attend the course of instruction at South Kensington last year was greater than there was room for, and that more than 60 were refused admission. It was well known that utter ignorance of agricultural chemistry was displayed by many farmers, and that there was a great waste of money in consequence.

EARL SPENCER wished to assure the noble Marquess that this subject was one in which he felt a very deep interest. He thought it was a matter of great importance to agriculturists in this country. As to the first part of the Question, which related to the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, he would point out that the large sum of money which was alleged to belong to that Body had not yet been realized by them. In fact, the Commissioners had no funds at their disposal at present to

to carry out any scheme which they looked forward to adopting in the future. In the Report to which the noble Marquess alluded, the Commissioners stated that they wished to found Scholarships for science in different parts of the country, and they hoped still at some future day to carry out that part of their scheme; and if they did, he felt assured that they would take agriculture into consideration along with other matters. With regard to the part of the Question referring to the Science and Art Department, he wished to say that last year his noble Friend who preceded him in Office laid on the Table a statement with respect to what had been done in the Department, and he would shortly refer to it. Since 1875 the Department had made payments in aid of instruction in agricultural science. In 1875-6 there were 150 students examined; in 1876-7, 800; in 1877-8, 1,265; and 1878-9, 365 for England, 177 for Scotland, and 1,651 for Ireland. That would show that the Department was fully alive to the importance of this subject, and that they had used their exertions throughout the country to have it considered. There could be no more important matter than this application of science to agriculture. Great attention had of late years been very properly called to the great aid which science gave to the various classes of manufacturers and producers; and that principle applied with quite as great force to agriculture as to any other art. This was especially the case at the present moment, when the country was inquiring very narrowly into the whole subject of agriculture. His noble Friend had proposed that the Commission should inquire into the subject, and he had no doubt that the Commission would consider this a subject to which it should give proper weight. If science would enable the agriculturists of this country to produce more from the land, by improving their appliances, than they had hitherto done, science would add another to the many great services it had rendered to us. With regard to the classes for agricultural science, he might say that last year 60 persons had applied to be permitted to avail themselves of the benefits offered by those classes, and that in no case had such an application been refused. It had been decided by the Department, in consequence of the pressure for accommodation for science classes and for instruction in various branches, not to have a special class for agricultural science this year, seeing that botany, geology, and chemistry, which were so intimately connected with agriculture, were taught separately. But since he had been in Office the matter had been brought under the attention of the Department again, and he had looked into the matter. He wished to announce that certain relaxations would be allowed, and that teachers might be able to earn result payments next year, on condition that after next year every teacher must have his certificate; and, lastly, considering the very great interest that had been felt on this subject throughout the country, the Department had now decided that a class for agriculture should be held this year, and that class would be held in August.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—FREE SEATS.—QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked Her Majesty's Government, Why there are not a larger number of free seats in Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, as in Battersea and other public Parks? He could not see why the public should not have the privilege of sitting down in these Parks without having to pay for it. The poorer classes on Sunday were specially incommoded by such an arrangement.

LORD SUDELEY admitted the desirability of there being a large number of free seats provided for the use of the public, and assured the noble Lord that the Board of Works had given great attention to the subject. The noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that there were more free seats in Victoria and Battersea Parks than there were in Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, although, perhaps, they did not make quite so much show in the latter as in the former. Between the Victoria Gate and the Marble Arch there were no fewer than 52 large seats, and the other parts of the Park were provided in a similar proportion. During the last five years 81 new large free seats had been placed in Kensington Gardens, being an average of 16 yearly, and 65 in Hyde and St. James's Parks, an average of 13 yearly; while during the present year, 22 additional large seats would be placed in Kensington Gardens and 31 in Hyde Park. He trusted that the noble Lord would consider that this was a sufficient provision, for the time at all events. They proposed to continue adding largely to these numbers every year.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE remarked, that Hyde Park being so much larger than the other Parks, it was a singular calculation to supply it only with about the same number of seats, in a given time, as the other Parks.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the City of Canterbury:

CANTERBURY ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To the Rt. Honble.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, knt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify that upon the 14th day of June 1880, and the two following days, we duly held a Court at Canterbury for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Canterbury between Henry Alexander Munro Butler Johnstone, Petitioner; and the Honble. Alfred Erskine Gathorne-Hardy, and Robert Peter Laurie, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, We certify that we determined that the said Respondents were not duly elected and returned, and that the said Election is void. And we hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices, that is to say, of bribery at the said Election:—

Thomas Washington Davey.
John Munns.
William Mount.
George Bass.
Edwin Bateman.
Thomas Dobson.
George Hart.
Thomas Holttum.
Thomas White.
Henry Link.
Edwin Williams.

3. That we have reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the said Petition relates.

In witness whereof we hereunto set our hands this 16th day of June 1880.

GEORGE DENMAN.
HENRY C. LOPES.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

TURKEY—THE DANUBE AND BLACK SEA RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. MELLOR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the following facts: that, some time before the Treaty of Berlin, a special tribunal was appointed by the Turkish Government to arbitrate between that Government and the Danube and Black Sea Railway Company; that this tribunal, in January 1879, made an award against the Turkish Government, by which award that Government was required to pay a sum, now amounting to £160,000 to the Danube and Black Sea Railway Company in respect of work done for and wrongs committed by that Government in violation of the Company's conceded rights, and was also required to restore to the Company valuable lands and quays, of which the Company had been forcibly dispossessed; whether the Turkish Government not having paid this amount, and being no longer in possession of territory in which the line is situated, the Roumanian Government is not now, by virtue of Article 51 of the Treaty of Berlin, liable to pay the amount awarded and to restore to the Company the lands and quays; and, whether he will communicate with the Special Ambassador at Constantinople and also the British Minister at Bucharest on the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the facts in this case are correctly stated by the hon. Member (Mr. Mellor) in his Question. The subject is one which has repeatedly engaged the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and very urgent representations have been made to the Roumanian and the Turkish Governments to induce them to come to an arrangement between themselves for a satisfactory award, leaving any question as to the liability of Roumania in respect of these particular items for subsequent adjustment. Both the Roumanian and the Turkish Governments have remained inactive in the matter, notwithstanding the continuous efforts of Her Majesty's Government. Within the last few days the Representatives of Her Majesty's Government at Constantinople and Bucharest have been instructed to make fresh representations, and if both Governments continue to decline to touch the matter, Her Majesty's Government will have to seriously consider what other steps shall be taken to secure the just rights of the Railway Company and the observance of the 21st Article of the Treaty of Berlin.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—DUTIES ON SALT.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been directed to the fact that differential Duties of about £1 a ton are now levied in Bengal on English salt, as against the Excise manufactured salt of the Bengal coast, and the salt of the Sambuhr Lake and adjoining sources; whether this is not contrary to the arrangement made by Sir Charles Wood in 1862 that English salt should have fair play in Bengal; and, whether he will endeavour to remedy this state of things so unfavourable to the English salt trade, and urge upon the Indian Government the equalisation of the Duties on salt in the Bengal Presidency?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, some unofficial correspondence has taken place between Mr. Palk, the Chairman of the Cheshire Chamber of Commerce, and the India Office respecting the grievance of which that Chamber complains. Mr. Palk has been asked to embody those alleged grievances in a formal Memorial; and on receiving the document it will be forwarded to the Government of India, with a despatch asking them to give the matter their due consideration, and to state their opinion upon it. Until the reply is received I am unable to communicate further with the hon. Member.

THE CENSUS—LEGISLATION.

MR. HUBBARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the Government propose bringing in the Census Bill; and, whether it will be uniform in its provisions for the United Kingdom and require a return of the religious profession of the people?

MR. GLADSTONE in reply, said, his right hon. Friend near him had given the best answer in his power, though one which certainly was not very definite, on the subject a short time ago. He was sorry to have to add that he could not even then positively state when the Bill would be brought in, as it was necessary to make progress with other Public Business. The Government had no intention of including in its provisions one providing for the taking of a religious Census, and intended to follow the course which had been pursued on previous occasions in England.

MR. HUBBARD said, he understood a religious Census was taken in Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was so.

H.M.S. "ATALANTA."

MR. CARBUTT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in the "South Wales Daily Telegram," purporting to be a copy of a letter received from one of the crew of H.M. ill-fated ship "Atalanta," dated from Barbadoes; and, if so, whether the statement that part of the crew mutinied, that six of them had been put in irons, and that one man received twenty-four lashes with the cat-o'-nine-tails, is correct; and if he can state the cause of the mutiny?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the statement contained in the letter referred to by the hon. Member appears to have been only partially true. From the quarterly punishment Returns of the Atalanta, it appears that on the 26th of December last a young seaman was awarded corporal punishment for endeavouring to incite mutiny on the lower deck in calling on others to come aft and forcibly release a prisoner from irons. Only one man was in irons at the time, and no other men were punished for the same offence. There is no mention of the matter in Captain Stirling's letters from Bermuda, and his report at the close of the quarterly punishment Return, dated December 31, was, "The general conduct of the crew and training draft has been very good."

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is in a position to state what has been the cost incurred by the Royal Commission on Agriculture to the end of last month, or if he can give the approximate cost?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the total disbursements on account of the Royal Commission on Agriculture down to the 31st of May last amount to £7,078.

THE IRISH LAND ACT—SMALL OWNERS.

MR. MOLLOY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the proposals contained in the Draft Report of the Secretary to the Admiralty, proposed by him as Chairman of the Select Committee of 1878 on the Irish Land Act of 1870, and which proposals are contained in paragraph 95 of said Draft Report, and are as follows:—

"That, in the present state of land ownership in Ireland, it is desirable that facilities should be given by the State for the conversion of tenancies into ownerships by purchase; that the increase of small owners would tend to give stability to the social system, would spread contentment and loyalty, and would give a spur to industry and thrift."

MR. GLADSTONE; Sir, I am not quite sure whether I understand the Question of the hon. Member (Mr. Molloy) as referring to the present period or as referring to a future period. It is undoubtedly our desire to propose legislation in accordance with the general view taken in the passage which the hon. Member has cited from the Report of the Select Committee. We are of opinion it is of great importance for the welfare of Ireland that Parliament should effect everything that is practicable in that respect. Indeed, among the first subjects we considered after the formation of the Government we made inquiry into this matter; and it was only because we found it would be too complex a subject for legislation during the present Session that we were obliged so far to postpone the attempt to give effect to our intentions.

THE SCIENCE AND ART MUSEUM, DUBLIN.

MR. FOLEY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether any and what arrangements are being made to proceed with the erection of the "Science and Art Museum" in Dublin; to whom the architectural plans of the proposed new buildings will be submitted for approval before they are adopted; whether architects resident in Ireland will have an opportunity of submitting plans for competition; and, if contractors who carry on their business in Ireland will have a like opportunity of competing for the erection of the proposed buildings, or whether it is intended by the Commissioners of the Board of Public Works in Ireland to erect the buildings according to their own plans and staff?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, in answer to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to say that the only arrangements made for the erection of the Science and Art Museum in Dublin are the settlement of the preliminaries with the Royal Dublin Society for the removal of their Agricultural Department. In answer to the remaining portion of the Question, I may say that the question of the preparation of plans and the employment of architects and contractors rests with the Board of Works in Dublin, subject to the approval of the Treasury. The Education Department has nothing to do with that part of the subject.

THE ARMY (INDIA)—ORGANIZATION AND EXPENDITURE.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Report of the Special Commission presided over by Sir Ashley Eden, to inquire into the organization and expenditure of the Army in India will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the Report had been received at the India Office. It was accompanied by a military despatch from the Government of India, dated the 4th of February, 1880, in which they expressed a hope that they would shortly be able to state their conclusions on the Report to the Home Government. That further explanation had not, however, been yet received; and until the views of the Government of India were in the possession of the Secretary of State for India, and until some decision had been formed as to the action to be taken upon the Report, it would not be possible for him to lay the Report on the Table of the House.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND).

MR. METGE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to mitigate the action of the rule by which the salaries of assistant teachers of the National Schools (Ireland) have, in certain cases, been withdrawn, owing to the low average attendance of scholars consequent on the prevailing distress, the assistant teachers being entirely dependent on their salaries for support?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I think the hon. Member is not altogether in possession of the facts of this case. The salary of the assistant teachers has not been reduced in consequence of the distress. There were 3,500 assistant teachers on the roll on the 1st of January, and the reduction of 68, which has since taken place in so large a number, has nothing at all to do with the distress. As regards the distress causing a smaller average attendance of scholars, I am very glad to say it has not done so. The average of the quarter ending the 31st March last showed an increase of 25,624, or something over 6 per cent of the whole of Ireland, compared with the average of the corresponding quarter last year. Twenty-five out of the 32 counties show an increase, and in these 25 counties are included all the districts where distress is great. I am very glad to be able to make that statement, and to say that the tendency to attend school is very much on the increase. The same thing occurred during the continuance of the Cotton Famine in Lancashire.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC—DETENTION OF BRITISH VESSELS IN THE RIVER PLATE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a British steamer, the "Plato," was boarded 40 miles from Buenos Ayres by the Argentine war steamer the "Constitution," and a guard of marines placed on board of her; and, whether the steam ship "Bessel" has been stopped and guarded; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, or propose to take, in the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the reports which have been received by Her Majesty's Government confirm the statement in the hon. Member's Question. The Plato was boarded on the morning of the 4th ultimo, and detained till the afternoon of the 5th., when the commander of the Argentine gunboat admitted the arrest was due to a mistake, and allowed the passengers and cargo to be landed. The Bessel was detained in the same way from the morning of the 5th of May till the evening of the same day, when she was also released. The cause of the arrests seem to have been the anxiety of the Argentine Government to prevent certain arms believed by them to have been shipped at Antwerp on board the Bessel from reaching the hands of disaffected persons in the country. The Plato appears to have been mistaken for the Bessel. Her Majesty's, Chargé d'Affairs at Buenos Ayres has made a strong representation on the subject to the Argentine Government, and Her Majesty's Government propose to await the answer to this communication before taking any further steps in the matter.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY—RELIGIOUS STATISTICS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state why he has refused to grant a Return of the number of Catholics, Protestants, and Presbyterians, in the various grades of the Irish Constabulary; and, whether it is a fact that among the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, the promotions of Protestants to higher rank and higher pay are immensely out of proportion to the respective totals of Protestants and Catholics in the Force?

MR. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, the hon. Member asked him two Questions. The first was, why he had refused to give a Return of the religion of the persons in the various grades of the Irish Constabulary? The reason he did so was that, judging from English experience, and perhaps from English feeling, he rather revolted against the idea of asking men in the service of the country what their religious opinions were. He had since ascertained, however, that a record of the religious belief of the members of the Constabulary already existed, and, consequently, if he refused any longer to make the required Return, he might probably give the idea that there was some reason for the refusal. Therefore, he should put the Return on the Table. At the same time, he must state that when he got to Ireland he should very seriously consider the real reason why the religious beliefs of the members of the Constabulary were recorded, and he hoped he should find out that he should be able to do away with it. The Return would itself answer the second part of the hon. Member's Question—namely, whether among the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, the promotions of Protestants to higher rank and higher pay were immensely out of proportion to the respective totals of Protestants and Catholics? He suspected that there

case; and, as it is probable that that course may be taken, I think I can hardly say what, in my opinion, is the law on the subject. If, however, the Court should refuse the mandamus, on the ground that the view of the Justices is correct, that it rests with the Returning Officer to institute proceedings, it will be a matter of consideration for the Government whether such a state of law should not be amended

THE ZULU WAR—COLONIAL EXPENDITURE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state to the House the amount of the sum alluded to in Lord Kimberley's Despatch to Sir H. B. Frere, No. 4, where it is stated "that the war cost the Colony a great sum, which has been already paid?"

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the Colonial Budget for the current year shows that the total war expenditure paid by the Government of the Cape of Good Hope to March, 1880, has been as follows:—Raised by loan, £750,000; from current revenue, £715,000; total, £1,465,000. Further estimated payments expected to be brought to account to June 30, the end of the financial year, £20,000; total, £1,485,757.

FISHERY PIERS (IRELAND).

MR. GREER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any portion of the Grant proposed by Her Majesty's Government to be devoted to Fishery purposes in Ireland will be applied to the extension or repairs of existing Fishing Piers in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the main object of the grant proposed by the Government to be devoted to fishery purposes in Ireland was the construction of new piers. He could not absolutely say that no part of the grant would be applied to the extension of existing piers; but certainly none of it would be spent on repairs.

THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When it is likely that the Select Committee on the Contagious Diseases Acts will be nominated; and what is the reason of the delay?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have been in communication with my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who originally moved in the matter, and with my right hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Massey), who was Chairman of the Committee in 1879 and in the last Session of the late Parliament. Some delay has occurred in selecting Members of the Committee to replace those who have not been returned to the present Parliament; but as soon as it is completed the Committee will be nominated, and I will move for its appointment with or without the names on Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — CIRCULAR OF THE LIBERAL CENTRAL OFFICE.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, upon the Committee responsible for the issue of the Liberal Circular alluded to by Mr. Justice Lush, the names appear of the following members of Her Majesty's present Government:—Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Lord Kensington, the Right Hon. W. P. Adam, Sir Henry James, and the Marquess of Hartington?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I must read this Question, in order to have a full view of its scope, in connection with a former Question, wherein the hon. and learned Gentleman asked the Home Secretary what steps he intended to take for the purpose of discovering and bringing to justice those gentlemen whom Mr. Justice Lush had declared to have been guilty of a misdemeanour in issuing a certain circular. I was in a state of happy ignorance upon all the facts connected with this case until the time when I saw the Notice of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that led me to make inquiries. I did know as much as this, that there was such an Association as the Liberal Association. I further ascertained that there was a Committee of that Association; and, further still, that several Members of Her Majesty's Government belonged to the Committee; but, unfortunately, to the disappointment of the hon. and learned Gentleman, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary does not belong to it. Under those circumstances, I trust the hon. and learned Gentleman will excuse cular case it had not been laid on the Table, and he had waited until it was before the House before he looked at it himself.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the judgment had been delivered in the House, but not printed in the Votes.

ARMY—WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the number of workmen at Woolwich Arsenal is being largely reduced; and whether such reductions are likely to continue; and, whether it is intended to remove the Army Clothing Factory from Pimlico; and, if so, whether it would not be desirable to utilise the buildings of Woolwich Dockyard, which have remained empty for many years, by transferring the Clothing Factory to Woolwich, and thereby giving employment to hundreds of artisans who lost their occupation through the closing of the Dockyard?

MR. CHILDERS: The Estimates for the Laboratory for 1880-81 provide for about 2,925 workmen during the year. On the 31st of January there were 3,401. The numbers to be reduced in that establishment, therefore, were 476. This reduction was effected gradually under an Order by my Predecessor in January last, and has now been carried out. The Estimates for the Gun Factory for this year provide for about 602 men, as against 950 men last year, and a gradual reduction is being made. This, however, does not describe the whole case, as the amount of work in the Gun Factory depends also on orders from other Departments, the sums received for which go in aid of the Vote. The number of men, therefore, must vary monthly; but, except in consequence of these orders failing us, no very great further reductions will be necessary. There is no intention of removing the Clothing Factory from Pimlico. It has been established at a cost of about £80,000 in buildings and machinery, and is in a very efficient condition.

NAVY—FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he is correctly reported to have stated, with reference to the question of flogging in the Navy,

that the Board of Admiralty fully and cordially approve the course Lord Northbrook intends to take; and, if so, whether the House is to understand that Lord Northbrook's professional advisers have unreservedly expressed their opinion that the time has arrived when the punishment of flogging can be entirely abolished in the Navy?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the passage which the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Price) has quoted correctly reports what I said upon that occasion. The terms in which I announced the intention of Lord Northbrook to introduce a Bill next year which will remove flogging from the authorized punishments of the Navy, and which will at the same time increase other punishments for some of the graver offences, were fully concurred in by the naval Colleagues of Lord Northbrook, and were verbatim the conclusions arrived at after discussion by Lord Northbrook and his Colleagues.

THE BALLOT ACT—SECTION 24—PERSONATION AT ELECTIONS.

MR. RYLANDS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the case of J. A. Howard, a Magistrate for Cheshire, wherein the Justices sitting in Petty Sessions, at Sandbach, refused to hear a charge of personation at the late Mid-Cheshire Election, brought against him on the ground that no one but the Returning Officer can institute such a prosecution; and, if such be the Law, whether the Government will take steps to make an alteration therein?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Sir, my attention has been called to the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) as having occurred in Cheshire, and to another similar case, in which Justices sitting in Petty Sessions have refused to hear charges of personation on the ground that the prosecutions were not instituted by the Returning Officer. The question arises under the 24th section of the Ballot Act, which provides that it shall be the duty of the Returning Officer to institute such prosecutions. I must answer my hon. Friend by saying that the determination of the Statute can easily be obtained by moving for a mandamus to compel the Justices to hear the case; and, as it is probable that that course may be taken, I think I can hardly say what, in my opinion, is the law on the subject. If, however, the Court should refuse the mandamus, on the ground that the view of the Justices is correct, that it rests with the Returning Officer to institute proceedings, it will be a matter of consideration for the Government whether such a state of law should not be amended

THE ZULU WAR—COLONIAL EXPENDITURE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state to the House the amount of the sum alluded to in Lord Kimberley's Despatch to Sir H. B. Frere, No. 4, where it is stated "that the war cost the Colony a great sum, which has been already paid?"

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the Colonial Budget for the current year shows that the total war expenditure paid by the Government of the Cape of Good Hope to March, 1880, has been as follows:—Raised by loan, £750,000; from current revenue, £715,000; total, £1,465,000. Further estimated payments expected to be brought to account to June 30, the end of the financial year, £20,000; total, £1,485,757.

FISHERY PIERS (IRELAND).

MR. GREER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any portion of the Grant proposed by Her Majesty's Government to be devoted to Fishery purposes in Ireland will be applied to the extension or repairs of existing Fishing Piers in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the main object of the grant proposed by the Government to be devoted to fishery purposes in Ireland was the construction of new piers. He could not absolutely say that no part of the grant would be applied to the extension of existing piers; but certainly none of it would be spent on repairs.

THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When it is likely that the Select Committee on the Contagious Diseases Acts

will be nominated; and what is the reason of the delay?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have been in communication with my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who originally moved in the matter, and with my right hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Massey), who was Chairman of the Committee in 1879 and in the last Session of the late Parliament. Some delay has occurred in selecting Members of the Committee to replace those who have not been returned to the present Parliament; but as soon as it is completed the Committee will be nominated, and I will move for its appointment with or without the names on Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — CIRCULAR OF THE LIBERAL CENTRAL OFFICE.

MR. W. P. Adam, Sir Henry James, and the Marquess of Hartington?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I must read this Question, in order to have a full view of its scope, in connection with a former Question, wherein the hon. and learned Gentleman asked the Home Secretary what steps he intended to take for the purpose of discovering and bringing to justice those gentlemen whom Mr. Justice Lush had declared to have been guilty of a misdemeanour in issuing a certain circular. Friend the Home Secretary does not belong to it. Under those circumstances, I trust the hon. and learned Gentleman will excuse me from going further into the particular terms of his Question, because he alludes not to the Committee of the Liberal Association, but to the Committee responsible for the issuing of the circular. I know nothing of the responsibility, and, not having the advantage of being an hon. and learned Gentleman, I wish to give no opinion or to describe any particulars with which I am not fully conversant. I hope that I have answered the Question to the best of my ability.

HERIOT'S HOSPITAL, EDINBURGH.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has given his approval to a Provisional Order relating to Heriot's Trust, Edinburgh, the terms of which are at variance with recommendations of the Endowed Schools (Scotland) Act of 1872, and with those contained in the special report of the Endowed Institutions Commission lately presented to Parliament in certain essential particulars, and especially as not containing any provision for the revision of the governing body?

MR. M'LAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he would explain to the House the exact form of the modified Provisional Order for Heriot's Hospital, as altered by him by virtue of the powers conferred on him by the Act, and then sent to the governors for their approval in terms of the Act, and returned by them unanimously approved of, does not contain provisions in the direction indicated in the Report of the Commissioners as being desirable on the following points, viz.:—whether it contains an obligation binding the governors to take over during the present year, the Watt Institution and School of Arts, now supported by voluntary contributions, and having 2,000 pupils, and to maintain that institution in all time coming as a great technical school or college for the industrial classes, and to provide £12,000 for new buildings, all out of the funds of the hospital; whether it provides additional bursaries for the University of Edinburgh to the extent which the principal of the university stated in his evidence would be satisfactory; whether it prohibits the erection of any additional free schools out of the surplus funds of the hospital, and requires that these should hereafter be applied for the benefit of the new technical school or college; whether it provides for the gradual reduction of the number of foundationers resident in the hospital from 120 to 60; and, with respect to the constitution of the governing body of the hospital, to ask, whether he has received any representation from any of the public bodies in Edinburgh, or from any party or any section of its inhabitants, expressing dissatisfaction with the present large and popularly chosen body of governors, and praying that there might be substituted for it a smaller and more exclusive body, as was recommended by the Commission appointed under the Act of 1872?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, the matter referred to by my hon. Friends is not yet finally concluded. As the subject is one of interest in Scotland, they will, perhaps, wish that I should state exactly how it now stands. The Commissioners have expressly recommended me to approve a Provisional Order authorizing the Governors of Heriot's Hospital to take over the Watt Institution as being a thing desirable in itself apart from all other reforms, and as justifying in itself the Provisional Order. That will be done. At the same time, the Commissioners took objection to the omission of other important reforms which were not provided for in the scheme as originally propounded by the Governors. The Governors have now offered to meet the views of the Commissioners on several of these omitted points. The proposals of the Governors on these particular heads, which are accurately stated in the Question of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren)—namely, the additional bursaries, the reduction of the foundationers resident, and the prohibition of additional free schools—appear to me to be reasonable and conformable to the views of the Commissioners, and to the advantage of higher education in Scotland. I am, therefore, not unwilling to include them in the Provisional Order recommended by the Commissioners. There will be still be some important points left unsettled, which, in the present state of things, it is impossible to insist upon; but the Provisional Order will not prejudice in any way the treatment of these questions in the future. There seems to me no reason for sacrificing the good which is obtainable, because it is impossible to accomplish at once all that might be desired. That was the principle on which the Commissioners have acted in recommending the issuing of a Provisional Order in respect of the Watt Institution, and it seems to me to be equally appropriate to the recent concession of the Governors. I have only to add that I propose immediately to communicate to the Commissioners the recent proposals of the Governors for the final settlement of the matter. With respect to the last part of the Question of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, I can only say I have not received representations from any of the public bodies in Edinburgh, or from any party or section of its inhabitants, expressing any dissatisfaction with the present Governing Body of Heriot's Hospital.

DISSOLVED HIGHWAY BOARDS (FINANCE).

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that in certain districts the Highway Boards have dissolved before they have paid their debts, collected the money due to them, or made up their accounts; and, whether he can suggest any means by which the inconvenience thus arising can be obviated?

MR. DODSON: Sir, two instances have been brought under the notice of the Board, in which the Quarter Sessions of a county have dissolved a highway district without making any provision in the order for the adjustment of accounts. The orders should have been made to take effect at such a date as would have enabled the Highway Boards to collect the money due to them, pay their debts, and give effect to any adjustment ordered by the Justices. The inconvenience arising from the neglect to take these precautions can only be remedied by voluntary arrangement or by fresh legislation.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CONDEMNED MEAT.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he is aware that meat condemned by the officers of the Corporation of London is dipped in creosote previous to being sold, so as to insure its not being re-sold for food, and if he will consider the practicability of adopting some such expedient with condemned beef and pork from Navy stores, so as to prevent its being used for victualling and poisoning our mercantile marine?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, no meat which has been condemned as unfit for food is now sold by the Admiralty in open market. In consequence, I believe, of representations made by Mr. Plimsoll, arrangements were made in 1878 for the sale of all beef and pork condemned as unfit for human food to a soap maker of high standing, under a guarantee to melt it down. This arrangement is still in force, and there is no reason to believe that any of such meat finds its way into the Mercantile Marine.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA."

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the "Blanche" not only failed to find traces of the "Atalanta," but also of any of the ice-bound vessels seen by the "Brunette;" and, whether any instructions have been sent to the "Blanche" to pursue that search, or, if the Admiralty proposes to take any other steps in the matter?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the Blanche has returned to Halifax after having cruised for three weeks to the eastward of the Newfoundland Banks, without finding any trace of the Atalanta, and without having come across any of the vessels said to be ice-bound by the master of the Brunette, although she met with a great deal of ice and several icebergs. It is not an uncommon thing for vessels bound to and from the St. Lawrence in the early part of the year to be ice-bound; and I observe, from a statement in The Standard to-day, that a vessel called the Wimmera ran into a field of ice at the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the early part of May, and remained there for some days, her master reporting that he saw no less than 50 other vessels, including steamers, in a similar position. The master, however, added that the ice began to separate on the 19th of May, and that his vessel soon got free; therefore, I presume that the other vessels were equally fortunate. Under these circumstances, the Admiralty do not propose to take any further steps in the matter.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS— EXCHANGES.

MR. MELDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, under the late Administration, when the Army Medical Department was being reorganised, a promise was not made that, in future, exchanges between medical officers would be allowed under the same regulations as for the rest of the Service, if such a regulation was adopted; whether a rule has lately been introduced that, in cases where such exchanges involve change of station, the officers exchanging shall forfeit all claim for pay for the period they occupy in changing; whether all other officers in the Army exchanging under similar circumstances continue to receive their pay without any stoppage; whether the regulation now in force placing medical officers on a different footing from other officers is not highly calculated to make the Army Medical Service unpopular; and, whether he will take steps to have the regulations as to exchange so modified as to carry out the promise made?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I have to say that I cannot find any record of a promise having been given by my Predecessor such as his Question implies; and I may state that no Order of any description has been given on the subject since I took Office. If, however, he will privately point out to me the promise to which he refers, I will look carefully into the whole question, which has not come before me in any shape.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE "CARRADALE."

MR. MIDDLETON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If his attention has been called to a statement that the "Antelope" (ship) of Boston, Capt. Chaney, arrived at Bombay on 15th May from Liverpool, reports having seen a large vessel ashore on the Island of Europa in the Mozambique Channel, on 25th March; that the "Antelope" drifted past in a calm and could not get near the island; if he has any reason to believe that the wrecked vessel is the "Carradale" which left the Tyne on the last day of November bound for Bombay; and, if he will give orders to send one of Her Majesty's Ships to Europa Island to inquire as to the wreck and crew?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, in consequence of a representation made to the Admiralty a telegraphic Order was given on the 12th instant to the senior officer at Zanzibar to send a vessel to inquire into the reported wreck at Europa Island. It is the opinion of the Admiralty that the wreck in question is not the vessel referred to by the hon. Member. It seems that when the Island was last visited in 1875, there was a wreck of an iron vessel lying there, and it is supposed that the vessel seen by the Antelope is the same vessel.

THE IRISH LAND ACT, 1870—SALE OF CHURCH LANDS TO OCCUPYING AND OTHER TENANTS.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government will include in the instructions to the proposed "Small Royal Commission on the Land Act of 1870," instructions to examine into the working and results of all sales made by the Church Temporalities Commissioners of Church Lands to occupying and other tenants?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I cannot give a positive answer to the Question. The hon. Member, however, is aware that the object of the Commission is the examination of the working of the Land Act of 1870. Well, that Act contains a number of clauses called the "Bright Clauses," and I think it must be very difficult to examine into so much of the working of the Act which relates to those clauses without, at the same time, finding out what was done by the Church Temporalities Commissioners with respect to the sale of Church lands.

M. CHALLEMEL LACOUR, THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR.

MR. SPEAKER called upon the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) to put a Question he had upon the Paper in reference to M. Challemel Lacour, the French Ambassador.

MR. O'DONNELL: Before I put this Question, Sir, I wish to call your attention to a fact, of which you are already aware, that I put down another Question relating to M. Challemel Lacour, and that you, with your usual courtesy, have intimated to me that that Question sinned in some respect against the Rules of the House. Considering the position which I occupy as a Member of this House in asking a Question in relation to the action of the Government and the criticisms to which I have been exposed on the part of the Government and of its supporters, will you allow me to ask you in general terms, carefully avoiding trenching on disputable matter, whether you can give the House a public explanation of the reasons why you have interfered with the publication of the Notice of my Question? The Question consisted of three parts. The first contained an extract from the telegram of a foreign politician; the second part asked whether Her Majesty's Government had been made aware of the contents of that telegram by our Ambassador in a foreign country; and the third part went on to ask—

MR. SPEAKER: I have already informed the hon. Member that the Question to which he is now adverting is a Question which ought not properly to be put; and, after that intimation, I think it is quite irregular on the part of the hon. Member to refer to it.

MR. O'DONNELL: Cannot I ask you, Sir, to what part of the Question you object? I only ask that as a Member of this House. I am particularly anxious to obey.

MR. SPEAKER: I am responsible to this House for the maintenance of its Rules and Orders. The Question which the hon. Member proposed to put appeared to me to advert to a matter beyond the cognizance of the House or of Her Majesty's Government; and on that ground I did not allow it to be placed upon the Paper.

MR. O'DONNELL: I am exactly as much in the dark as ever. I ask you, as a matter connected with the Privileges of a Member of this House, if you will inform me and this House—

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY: I rise to Order. I wish to know, Whether the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), in the course he is now taking, is not, after the Rule you have twice laid down, disregarding the authority of the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: I must caution the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) to confine himself to the two Questions upon the Paper; and if the hon. Member disregards the authority of the Chair in that respect I shall be bound to take action in the matter.

MR. O'DONNELL: May I ask you, Sir, according to your authority, and according to the Rules of the House, in what manner I can bring your decision before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I call upon the hon. Member now to confine himself to the two Questions on the Paper. If he does not attend to my intimation, I shall at once call on the hon. Member whose name appears next on the Paper to put his Question, and I shall pass over the Questions of the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

MR. O'DONNELL: Under these circumstances, I decline to put any Question at all.

THE IRISH LAND ACT, 1870—THE NEW ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, when the Government agreed to recommend Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870, he was aware that the Royal Commission appointed last year to inquire into the causes and extent of the present agricultural distress was already conducting inquiries as to the operation of the Land Act; that two Assistant Commissioners had been collecting evidence on the subject for some months past; that a preliminary report from these Commissioners had been received and printed; that Professor Baldwin and Major Robertson had been examined at great length by the Commissioners; that arrangements had been made by the Commissioners to open an inquiry at Dublin on Monday first; that witnesses whose examinations will occupy several days have been invited and have engaged to be present at that time; and, whether he will persevere in recommending to Her Majesty to appoint a new Royal Commission to institute inquiries of the same description in Ireland as those now being carried out by the existing Commission, as such appointment might be calculated to impart a partisan character to an investigation that ought to be impartial and judicial?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I may state, without entering into the various details which the hon. Member has put into the Preamble, that we were perfectly aware that inquiries into the working of the Land Act were within the scope of the instructions given to the Royal Commission on Agriculture; and, further, that the Royal Commission on Agriculture either had begun, or was about to take—had, in fact, taken preliminary steps, and was about to take further steps, for entering upon the execution of that part of its Commission; but I am by no means able to say that we recede in any respect from our intention to recommend to Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870, and the reason why we intend to take that step is this. In the first place, that we think that the gravity of the circumstances attending the condition of the Irish population in certain parts of Ireland at the present moment is such as to require attention from a Royal Commission, which should be immediate, and entire, and undivided. We think it quite impossible for the existing Royal Commission to fulfil those conditions without sacrificing to them its other equally important duties in a multitude of other particulars; and, therefore, in no spirit of disrespect or want of confidence in the existing Royal Commission, we have thought it right to take those proceedings for the purpose of obtaining, at the earliest possible moment, the most authentic information on a subject so important as the condition of Ireland. This intention was communicated by me to the Duke of Richmond, as head of the Commission, yesterday morning; and the Duke of Richmond made known the intentions of the Government to the Commission at its meeting yesterday.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—KILKENNY COUNTY.

MR. MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the teachers of National Schools in the county of Kilkenny, or any, and, if so, how many of them, whose pupils were examined in March last for result fees, have not as yet been paid the fees then earned; and, if it is the fact that the sums many months ago directed to be given by way of increase to class salaries remain as yet unpaid to those teachers; and, if so, can he state the reasons for the delay in the payment of such fees and sums, and how soon the teachers may anticipate that they will receive payment of the same respectively?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I find, Sir, that there is one National School in Kilkenny, out of all the schools examined, in which money ordered to be paid as result fees has not yet been handed over. This is an exceptional case, having to be settled by correspondence with the Inspector before it can be definitely determined whether certain important conditions have been fulfilled or not. I further find that the increase alluded to in the second part of the Question has been paid to the whole staff of 11,000 teachers, with the exception of a few cases, in which the managers have delayed sending up their claims, and some other cases of a very exceptional character, which require to be referred to the Department.

SCOTLAND—THE TAY BRIDGE DISASTER—THE REPORT.

MR. HENDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state when the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Tay Bridge disaster will be issued?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, as the hon. Member (Mr. Henderson) is aware, the evidence in the case of the inquiry into the Tay Bridge disaster is very voluminous, and raises many very important and complicated questions. I am informed that the preparation of the Report is far advanced; and although I cannot state the precise date when it will be issued, I hope it will be ready before many days.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—DULWICH COLLEGE—THE NEW SCHEME.

MR. BRYCE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Education Department has yet received from the Charity Commission the new Scheme for the administration of Dulwich College; and, if not, whether the Government, considering the great injury to this important foundation which the continuance of the present state of uncertainty involves, will take steps to accelerate the action of the Charity Commissioners?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that the Education Department have not yet received from the Charity Commission the new Scheme for the administration of Dulwich College. But I am informed by the Commissioners that the Scheme has been revised throughout, and is now in the printers' hands in the form in which, subject to a reference to the Governors upon one point, it is proposed to submit it to the Committee of Council on Education. As soon as we receive it, it shall be promptly considered and dealt with.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—ST. OLAVE'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

MR. COHEN asked the Vice President of the Council, Under what circumstances and for what reason the draft scheme for the administration of St. Olave's Grammar School, which was published in 1877 by the Charity Commissioners, has not been proceeded with?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have communicated with the Charity Commissioners as to the draft scheme for St. Olave's Grammar School, and I have been furnished with a memorandum stating in great detail the reasons why the proceedings in regard to the scheme have been suspended. It appears that the scheme is objected to not only by the existing Governors, but by nine other public Bodies. To some of these objections it is impossible for the Commissioners or the Education Department to yield. For instance, it is opposed to the principle of all modern educational endowment schemes to establish a system of indiscriminate gratuitous education without regard to merit; and this is one of the main objections urged against the scheme. I am authorized by the Charity Commissioners to say that they have always been willing, and they are now ready, to proceed with the scheme, providing the Governors and the objecting Bodies will concede these questions of principle. Of course, if no agreement can be arrived at, the Commissioners may act on the authority vested in them.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL—THE NEW CLAUSE AND SCHEDULE.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice that in Committee on this Bill he would move the insertion of a clause to the effect that, having regard to the distress now existing in all parts of Ireland arising from failure of crops and unusual depression in the price of farm produce, it is desirable to suspend for two years all proceedings in ejectments in respect of agricultural holdings at and under £20, and it is hereby provided that all proceedings for the recovery of any land or tenement where a year's rent or more is in arrear be suspended for a period of two years from the passing of this Act.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the amendment of the Bill for the Relief of Distress in Ireland, on the subject of the temporary provisions regarding ejectment for non-payment of rent, When he will cause to be placed on the Table the Schedule mentioned in the said Amendment, showing the districts to which it is intended to apply; and, also, whether, having regard to the desirability of enabling Members to know approximately, before the conclusion of the debate on the Second Reading, the extent of the applicability of the Amendment, he will state generally the principle on which the Schedule of Districts is to be constructed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I believe that the subject does not, strictly speaking, come within the scope of the debate on the second reading. I thought it would be convenient for every Member of this House who looked into the matter to have the Amendment on the Table as soon as I could put it, for the House, of course, will only assent to the principle of the second reading of the Bill which is before it, and the Amendment must come on when we go into Committee. With regard to the Schedule, I had hoped to have it ready yesterday. I trust I shall to-day. The principle upon which it will be framed is, that it will apply to those districts which have been scheduled for the purpose of loans at very cheap rates to landlords or to sanitary authorities, that being, to our mind, a proof of the distress existing in those districts. I do say that it will exactly correspond, but it will practically and substantially correspond, with that geographical description.

IRELAND—THE MUNICIPAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

MR. DAWSON (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When he expects that the Report of the Irish Municipal Boundary Commission will be issued; and, whether, if there is likely to be any considerable delay, he will consider the advisability of having the Report on Dublin issued separately?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the Chairman of the Municipal Boundary Commissioners tells me there is no prospect of the Report being completed before the end of next October. I do not think it would be advisable to make a separate Report with regard to Dublin. At this stage of the Session, and with so much Business on hand, it will be almost impossible to legislate on the subject, and I think it would be a disadvantage to anticipate the complete Report.

EVESHAM BOROUGH WRIT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Evesham, in the room of Daniel Rowlinson Ratcliffe, esquire, whose Election hath been determined to be void."—(Lord Kensington.)

MR. J. R. YORKE, in moving as an Amendment—

"That the issue of the Writ for the Borough of Evesham be suspended until the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the Judge and the Evidence taken at the Trial of the Election Petition be laid upon the Table of the House," said, he rose for the purpose of making some observations upon the question of the time required by law to elapse between the Notice of Motion for a Writ and the Motion itself. There were two main questions to be determined whenever Judges went to the country to try an Election Petition. The direct object was to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the candidates returned; but the indirect object was to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the constituency. Now, the conditions for the due fulfilment of this second object were not satisfactory. It was comparatively rare that candidates who had been guilty of even a small breach of electoral law escaped the attacks of determined opponents; but it was quite another matter with the constituencies. The Judge could only form opinions upon the morality of the constituency from circumstances casually brought to his notice during the trial of the Petition, and the interest of all concerned in the case prompted them to make those circumstances appear as trivial as possible. No sooner had sufficient been proved before the Judge to make him declare the seat void than the parties on both sides made their bow and dispersed; and under our present system only 48 hours were required to elapse in the House of Commons before another Writ could be moved for to enable the constituency to renew what might be its malpractices, or, as it would be called, its agreeable experience with fresh candidates. What he objected to was that, as soon as sufficient had been proved to vacate a seat, every opportunity of investigating the question of the moral state of the constituency was withdrawn from the cognizance of the Judge. He contended that it was almost impossible for the House of Commons in 48 hours to make up its mind, rationally and deliberately, as to whether, in consequence of any circumstances which might have come to the cognizance of the Judge during the election, or of any other material points of which it might become aware from any other source, it was desirable or not that a Writ should be issued or withheld. He knew nothing particular about the borough of Evesham; but this was the first opportunity he had had of calling attention to the matter. He would conclude by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Amendment. The case, in his opinion, was even stronger than it appeared as represented by the previous speaker, for the Report of the Judges in the case of the Evesham Election Petition was not presented until Wednesday; so that practically, in this instance, there had been only an interval of 24 hours between the unseating of the Member and the moving for a new Writ. Evesham was a petty borough, the smallest in England, and a corrupt borough, and there was no great Constitutional necessity for immediately proceeding to a fresh election. Some time ago he had occasion to look into the question of rotten boroughs, and he was surprised to see how many existed. It was true that in England they were not so small as they were in Ireland, where they were as small as 2,000 and 3,000 people, or, as he might express it, it took two rotten Englishmen to make one rotten Irishman. In looking into the case of Evesham, he found that its population was 4,800, man, woman, and child, and that the circumstances which led to the Petition were of a very peculiar character. From the newspaper report of the evidence, he found that a very rich and a very charitable gentleman built a house at Evesham, and in the year immediately preceding the General Election he had in various ways given away an immense amount in charity. It was probably only a coincidence; but that gentleman had also a great desire to obtain a seat in Parliament, and perhaps it was only a still further coincidence that those in receipt of those charities had votes, and the gentleman who was appointed as his agent to distribute his charities was also the agent for his electioneering campaign, the consequence of which was that the moneys for the charities and for the election got mixed up, bringing them within the law. Then, upon the inquiry the agent was not examined, but the candidate was; and he stated, as candidates always did, that he had not had anything to do with the bribing of voters. He gave his money to his agent for charitable purposes, and the result was the bribing of voters. Finally, the candidate was pronounced guilty of bribery, through his agents, and the election was declared void. In this instance, the Report of the Judges was a shrewd one, for it stated that on the evidence before them, to which alone they confined their attention, they could not report that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. The Judges had made no inquiry of an inquisitorial character, the parties having apparently patched up the matter. In the case of that very rotten borough, and in view of the fact that the agent was not put in the box for examination, he asked the Government whether it was of such great Constitutional necessity that the Writ should immediately issue; and he thought it would not be a very great evil if the question were allowed to remain until the question of the re-distribution of seats was brought before the House; and, at any rate, he hoped the Government would let the House have an opportunity of considering the whole of the circumstances before they were pledged to the issue of the Writ.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the issue of the Writ for the Borough of Evesham be suspended until the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the Judge and the Evidence taken at the Trial of the Election Petition be laid upon the Table of the House,"—(Mr. Reginald Yorke,)

—instead thereof.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped the House would consent to the hon. Member's (Mr. J. R. Yorke's) Amendment. It was well known to many hon. Members that he (Mr. Newdegate) had always viewed the operation of the Ballot Act with great apprehension. The first political lesson he had ever learnt was when he visited the United States of America, in the midst of the elections to Congress, and got behind the scenes as much as he could, in order to satisfy himself what was the real operation of the system of Ballot. That was now very many years ago; and every report from the United States he had since read only convinced him that the American people were unable to relieve themselves of the prevalence of corruption which he then witnessed, and which had gone on increasing ever since. Their only protection, in fact, seemed to consist in the enormous magnitude of the constituencies, whilst even that afforded an inadequate protection. The corruption was practised not merely by individuals, but by means of a system of what were really secret societies. In the United States the feeling was growing of a desire to be delivered from the Ballot, could but the means be devised for effecting it. He did not wish to see the democratic institutions of America imported wholesale into this country; he hoped, therefore, that the House would, in the present instance, with a view of preserving something of the traditional forms of constituencies in this country, give the requisite time for examination, when cases of corruption such as that before the House had been proved to have occurred under the Ballot; because he was convinced, from the very nature working of the Land Act were within the scope of the instructions given to the Royal Commission on Agriculture; and, further, that the Royal Commission on Agriculture either had begun, or was about to take—had, in fact, taken preliminary steps, and was about to take further steps, for entering upon the execution of that part of its Commission; but I am by no means able to say that we recede in any respect from our intention to recommend to Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870, and the reason why we intend to take that step is this. In the first place, that we think that the gravity of the circumstances attending the condition of the Irish population in certain parts of Ireland at the present moment is such as to require attention from a Royal Commission, which should be immediate, and entire, and undivided. We think it quite impossible for the existing Royal Commission to fulfil those conditions without sacrificing to them its other equally important duties in a multitude of other particulars; and, therefore, in no spirit of disrespect or want of confidence in the existing Royal Commission, we have thought it right to take those proceedings for the purpose of obtaining, at the earliest possible moment, the most authentic information on a subject so important as the condition of Ireland. This intention was communicated by me to the Duke of Richmond, as head of the Commission, yesterday morning; and the Duke of Richmond made known the intentions of the Government to the Commission at its meeting yesterday.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—KILKENNY COUNTY.

MR. MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the teachers of National Schools in the county of Kilkenny, or any, and, if so, how many of them, whose pupils were examined in March last for result fees, have not as yet been paid the fees then earned; and, if it is the fact that the sums many months ago directed to be given by way of increase to class salaries remain as yet unpaid to those teachers; and, if so, can he state the reasons for the delay in the payment of such fees and sums, and how soon the teachers may anticipate that they will receive payment of the same respectively?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I find, Sir, that there is one National School in Kilkenny, out of all the schools examined, in which money ordered to be paid as result fees has not yet been handed over. This is an exceptional case, having to be settled by correspondence with the Inspector before it can be definitely determined whether certain important conditions have been fulfilled or not. I further find that the increase alluded to in the second part of the Question has been paid to the whole staff of 11,000 teachers, with the exception of a few cases, in which the managers have delayed sending up their claims, and some other cases of a very exceptional character, which require to be referred to the Department.

SCOTLAND—THE TAY BRIDGE DISASTER—THE REPORT.

MR. HENDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state when the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Tay Bridge disaster will be issued?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, as the hon. Member (Mr. Henderson) is aware, the evidence in the case of the inquiry into the Tay Bridge disaster is very voluminous, and raises many very important and complicated questions. I am informed that the preparation of the Report is far advanced; and although I cannot state the precise date when it will be issued, I hope it will be ready before many days.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—DULWICH COLLEGE—THE NEW SCHEME.

MR. BRYCE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Education Department has yet received from the Charity Commission the new Scheme for the administration of Dulwich College; and, if not, whether the Government, considering the great injury to this important foundation which the continuance of the present state of uncertainty involves, will take steps to accelerate the action of the Charity Commissioners?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that the Education Department have spect to it applied also to the treatment of other places.

MR. GLADSTONE said, there was already a rule that the shorthand writers' notes in cases of this description should be laid on the Table; but it was not usual to print them, unless they were asked for on some special ground. This case appeared to be of a special character; and, as his hon. and learned Friend had explained, the Government were willing to postpone the issue of the Writ. Perhaps it would be better to withdraw the Motion, if the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Amendment, on the understanding that it would not be renewed until after the evidence and the Report of the Judges had been received.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) then gave Notice that to-morrow he would move that the shorthand notes taken before the Judges in the Evesham case be printed.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Postmaster General, Whether it was his intention to take the Post Office Money Bill to-night; if so, after what hour would he not take it?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that he would bring on the Bill if he had an opportunity of doing so; but he would not bring it on after half-past 11 o'clock.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow (Friday), and what Business would be taken on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and on Tuesdays and Fridays for the future. The resumption of the debate on the Irish Relief Bill was the first Order for that evening; and if the second reading were agreed to, he proposed, if it were agreeable to the feeling of the House, to take the Committee to-morrow. Otherwise the Savings Banks Bill would be proceeded with. On Monday Supply would be the first Order of the Day.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Navy Estimates?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Civil Service Estimates.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 205.]
(Mr. William Edward Forster, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [11th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was sorry to be obliged to state that he found it to be his duty to move the adjournment of the debate. He thought that no one in the House or any Member of the Government would be surprised at his taking that step, when they reflected upon the course which Her Majesty's Government had pursued with regard to the Bill. It was only on Friday last that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), in moving the second reading of the Bill, stated that the subjects to be discussed at the present time in reference to Irish distress were comparatively few in number. They might now look forward to a good harvest; and, therefore, it would be only necessary to provide for a comparatively short period. The noble Lord added that the main object of the present Bill was to provide funds for carrying out the Relief of Distress Act, which was passed last Session. In those observations of the noble Lord he (Mr. Chaplin) entirely concurred, and if that was the sole object of the Bill he should be most anxious to assist its progress; but he must point out to the House that the whole situation was changed in consequence of a statement which had been made a night or two before by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the Bill was no longer a measure the chief object of which was the relief of distress; it was, in fact, neither more nor less than a new Irish Land Act of 1870, and one which embodied all the worst and most vicious features of that Act; and not only that, but which exaggerated and extended those features in a degree which could never have been anticipated even from the action of the present Administration. He was referring to the new clause proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, which had been distributed to Members only that morning, and which he was practically asking the House to read a second time that evening after only six hours' notice. His (Mr. Chaplin's) objections to that clause were of a two-fold character. He objected to the manner in which the clause had been introduced, and he objected still more to the nature of the clause now that it had been introduced. He was tempted to ask why the clause was not introduced into the Bill in the first instance? Was it part of a deliberate and settled policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or was it not? If it was, why was it not originally incorporated in the Bill? If it was not so, then he thought they were entitled to ask what had occurred since Friday last, when the noble Lord spoke in those terms which he had quoted, to bring about this change in the policy of the Government? He himself was quite unable to judge from the previous utterances of the Government whether this was part of their original intentions or not.

THE O'DONOGHUE: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, if the hon. Gentleman is in Order in discussing the principles of the Bill on a Motion for the adjournment of the debate?

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill before the House is one for the relief of distress in Ireland. The hon. Member on that question has moved an adjournment of the debate, and he is in Order in taking the course he has now taken.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he must ask the permission of the House to make one or two quotations from previous speeches delivered from the Treasury Bench with regard to this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said, on the 20th of May last—

"It had been asked why the subject had not been mentioned in the Queen's Speech; but he might observe . . . that it was not usual to make mention in the gracious Speech from the Throne of any measures which it was not intended to bring forward in the Session which that Speech opened, and the Government would have been departing from the practical manner in which legislation ought to be, and generally was, conducted in that House if Her Majesty were advised to hint at measures with which it was not intended to proceed."

Would not that lead anyone to suppose that this clause, which, in his (Mr. Chaplin's) judgment, was in reality a new Irish Land Act, was one of those measures with which the Government did not intend to proceed? He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman would reconcile it with the following sentence, in which he said—

"The Land Question was not only one which was most important, but one with which its very importance made it exceedingly difficult to deal in a comprehensive manner. To have brought in a 10 minutes' Irish Land Bill would, in his opinion, have been a most unwise course to adopt. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) said they might bring forward an interim Bill for the suspension of payment of rent. [Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: No; suspension of eviction.] He thought that was almost the same thing. He was quite prepared to listen to any arguments which the hon. Member by whom such a Bill was brought in might advance. He had no desire to prejudge the question; but would any hon. Member on either side of the House suppose that it would not bring in its discussion, if brought forward by the Government, every branch of the Land Question?"—[3 Hansard, cclii. 155-6-7.]

No; and he supposed if the right hon. Member had given Notice to introduce a Bill to transfer the property of the landlords of Ireland bodily to the tenants he would not in the least prejudge the question, and would have told the hon. Member that he was ready to listen to any arguments that he might advance. That was exactly his case. The Government had, as he contended, introduced such a Bill, and it was absolutely necessary that every branch of this important question should be discussed. It was impossible, however, for the House of Commons at six hours' notice to discuss properly a subject of such tremendous importance.

MR. W. E. FORSTER rose to a point of Order. He understood the hon. Gentleman to state that there ought to be an adjournment, because he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had given Notice of his intention to propose a clause in Committee. The hon. Member said time ought to be given for the discussion of that clause. He rose in Order to ask whether, inasmuch as the clause was not in the Bill at present, and as only Notice had been given that it would be brought forward in Committee, it was in Order to discuss that clause on the second reading of the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER said, public Notice having been given on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to introduce a clause of that character, and such a not yet received from the Charity Commission the new Scheme for the administration of Dulwich College. But I am informed by the Commissioners that the Scheme has been revised throughout, and is now in the printers' hands in the form in which, subject to a reference to the Governors upon one point, it is proposed to submit it to the Committee of Council on Education. As soon as we receive it, it shall be promptly considered and dealt with.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—ST. OLAVE'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

MR. COHEN asked the Vice President of the Council, Under what circumstances and for what reason the draft scheme for the administration of St. Olave's Grammar School, which was published in 1877 by the Charity Commissioners, has not been proceeded with?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have communicated with the Charity Commissioners as to the draft scheme for St. Olave's Grammar School, and I have been furnished with a memorandum stating in great detail the reasons why the proceedings in regard to the scheme have been suspended. It appears that the scheme is objected to not only by the existing Governors, but by nine other public Bodies. To some of these objections it is impossible for the Commissioners or the Education Department to yield. For instance, it is opposed to the principle of all modern educational endowment schemes to establish a system of indiscriminate gratuitous education without regard to merit; and this is one of the main objections urged against the scheme. I am authorized by the Charity Commissioners to say that they have always been willing, and they are now ready, to proceed with the scheme, providing the Governors and the objecting Bodies will concede these questions of principle. Of course, if no agreement can be arrived at, the Commissioners may act on the authority vested in them.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL—THE NEW CLAUSE AND SCHEDULE.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice that in Committee on this Bill he would move the insertion of a clause to the effect that, having regard to the distress now existing in all parts of Ireland arising from failure of crops and unusual depression in the price of farm produce, it is desirable to suspend for two years all proceedings in ejectments in respect of agricultural holdings at and under £20, and it is hereby provided that all proceedings for the recovery of any land or tenement where a year's rent or more is in arrear be suspended for a period of two years from the passing of this Act.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the amendment of the Bill for the Relief of Distress in Ireland, on the subject of the temporary provisions regarding ejectment for non-payment of rent, When he will cause to be placed on the Table the Schedule mentioned in the said Amendment, showing the districts to which it is intended to apply; and, also, whether, having regard to the desirability of enabling Members to know approximately, before the conclusion of the debate on the Second Reading, the extent of the applicability of the Amendment, he will state generally the principle on which the Schedule of Districts is to be constructed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I believe that the subject does not, strictly speaking, come within the scope of the debate on the second reading. I thought it would be convenient for every Member of this House who looked into the matter to have the Amendment on the Table as soon as I could put it, for the House, of course, will only assent to the principle of the second reading of the Bill which is before it, and the Amendment must come on when we go into Committee. With regard to the Schedule, I had hoped to have it ready yesterday. I trust I shall to-day. The principle upon which it will be framed is, that it will apply to those districts which have been scheduled for the purpose of loans at very cheap rates to landlords or to sanitary authorities, that being, to our mind, a proof of the distress existing in those districts. I do say that it will exactly correspond, but it will practically and substantially correspond, with that geographical description.

IRELAND—THE MUNICIPAL BOUND- ARY COMMISSION.

MR. DAWSON (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieu-of that system of voting, that it secretly afforded opportunities for corruption and concealment, and greatly increased the difficulty of detection, interposing such difficulties as did not exist under the system of open voting. It was, therefore, still more necessary to suspend Writs, as had often been done in former years, whenever evidence of corruption practised at recent elections had been proved.

Mr. RYLANDS concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment (Mr. J. R. Yorke). It was of the greatest importance that they should take care not to issue Writs where there had been suspicion of corruption. He was totally at a loss to understand why there could be any reason for pressing the issue of this Writ. He would, however, advise the House to proceed with caution, as, on the present occasion, they were forming a precedent for future guidance.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could assure the House there was not the slightest wish on the part of the Government to press forward the issue of the Writ. At the same time, it was desirable that a rule should be laid down and followed unless special circumstances justified a deviation from it. A rule had been established and acted on for some years that a Writ should not be issued until after two days' Notice, the object of which was to allow any hon. Member who wished to do so the opportunity to draw the attention of the House to any special circumstance connected with the election. Prima facie, there ought to be no unnecessary delay in the issuing of a Writ. A constituency was entitled to representation, and it was not desirable to prolong the period of an electioneering contest. Unless there was some special circumstance on which objection could be founded, there ought not to be undue delay. If the Judges reported to the House that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, there was no discretion left, and a Commission must be appointed. Let him remind the House of the position it was placed in. By the Act of 1868 the House of Commons had delegated all authority for the trial of Election Petitions to a tribunal; but what could the House do in this case if it came to the conclusion that corrupt practices had prevailed? No provision was made for further inquiry. In this case, however, the Report of the Judges was somewhat peculiar. Instead of reporting that there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, they said that, from the evidence before them, and to which they had confined themselves, they had no reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. The House could not properly act upon the suggestion made that there had been an arrangement by which persons had been kept out of the witness-box, nor could it be influenced by the general description of a place as corrupt. The House must apply a general rule, apart from any particular character which hon. Members might choose to give to a place, and it must be careful not to suspend a Writ without a good reason for doing so. If, however, an attempt were made in this case to prevent the reading of the evidence before the issue of the Writ, it would be thought there was some reason in the background why the issue of the Writ was forced on. In the particular circumstances, the Government would offer no objection to delay in the issue of the Writ; but it must be understood that when the shorthand-writers' notes of the evidence had been produced the Motion for the issue of the Writ would be almost immediately renewed.

Mr. R. H. PAGET asked whether, after the statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General that it was doubtful if the House would be able to obtain further investigation of the circumstances of the election at Evesham, the Government would take steps to introduce a measure which would enable the House to give effect to its opinions, if it was decided that further investigation should be made into any case.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON asked whether, seeing that the case of Evesham was not peculiar in any way, the Government would lay on the Table of the House the shorthand writers' notes in all cases in which Petitions had resulted in the unseating of the sitting Members. He knew nothing as to the particular circumstances at Evesham; but it appeared to him that it had been rather unfairly singled out, since other Petitions had disclosed quite as grave a state of things as that which had been shown to have taken place at Evesham, and the same arguments which had been used in re-clauses; but in this case, Notice having been given of such an important new clause, the House will be prevented from discussing the Bill properly, unless some reference is made to it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought it might be convenient to the House if he said a few words. For reasons which he was ready at the proper time to explain, he thought it right to propose that clause in the Bill, which would be the most convenient place, and he gave Notice of it as soon as he came to that conclusion, believing it would be for the convenience of hon. Members. He supposed at the time—but now found he was mistaken—that the debate would be confined to the Bill before the House, because the second reading, which was asked for, could only be the second reading of the Bill; therefore, the vote for or against the second reading would only be for what was in the Bill. Now, however, he was informed that the Speaker thought it would be impossible to prevent the debate extending to the clause; and, as the clause was not really before them, no vote could be taken upon it; and, therefore, he thought that what the Speaker said must happen would subject them to the inconvenience of debating matters on which they could not vote. That being the case, though he thought it a public inconvenience, he rose for the purpose of saying that, under the circumstances, he should not persevere with the clause in question, but should embody the substance of it in a separate Bill, which he would ask the House to pass at a later day.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that in consequence of the statement and action of the Chief Secretary for Ireland he would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, he confessed that he did not see how they could discuss the question of the relief of distress in Ireland within the narrow limits now proposed to be assigned to it by the Bill now before the House. In the judgment of all those who had lived longest in Ireland, and had most carefully considered the condition of the people of that country, it always had been apparent that the main cause of periodical

famines there was the condition of Irish land tenure. It would, therefore, be a matter of practical impossibility for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, by the adoption of the course which he had now announced—namely, the withdrawal of the clause, Notice of which the right hon. Gentleman had given a day or two ago, to limit the discussion of the question within the very narrow limits he proposed. It would be his (Mr. Parnell's) duty to move certain clauses which would put the question of this distress in Ireland upon its proper footing before the country. They had too long been told that distress in Ireland proceeded from the laziness and want of thrift of the Irish people. They had been too long in the habit of appearing before the nations of the world as beggars for charity; and there were many people—in fact, the majority of the people of Ireland—who now thought that the time had come when this practice should cease, and that they should have the opportunity of living in their own country, and of obtaining prosperity from the natural riches and resources of the country—an opportunity which the laws of England had denied them for so long a period. What was wanted by the Irish people was not so much that they should be relieved from the necessities produced by famine out of Imperial funds as that they should be put in a position to manage their own business by an Irish Parliament, instead of being subject, as was the case under the last Parliament, to alien legislation. What was the Bill of the present Government? It was a Bill which simply sought to carry out the policy of the Predecessors of the present Government—a policy which consigned 250,000 people to death by starvation. What were the steps taken by the late Government? The House would recollect that distress in Ireland had been predicted by those best acquainted with the circumstances of the country, and publicly predicted during the last 12 months. It was in the May of 1879 that public attention first came to be directed to the probability—the extreme probability—that the wet season would produce suffering in many of the Western portions of Ireland. These complaints were made publicly, and how were they answered by the late Government? He found that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, which had been distributed to Members only that morning, and which he was practically asking the House to read a second time that evening after only six hours' notice. His (Mr. Chaplin's) objections to that clause were of a two-fold character. He objected to the manner in which the clause had been introduced, and he objected still more to the nature of the clause now that it had been introduced. He was tempted to ask why the clause was not introduced into the Bill in the first instance? Was it part of a deliberate and settled policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or was it not? If it was, why was it not originally incorporated in the Bill? If it was not so, then he thought they were entitled to ask what had occurred since Friday last, when the noble Lord spoke in those terms which he had quoted, to bring about this change in the policy of the Government? He himself was quite unable to judge from the previous utterances of the Government whether this was part of their original intentions or not.

THE O'DONOGHUE: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, if the hon. Gentleman is in Order in discussing the principles of the Bill on a Motion for the adjournment of the debate?

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill before the House is one for the relief of distress in Ireland. The hon. Member on that question has moved an adjournment of the debate, and he is in Order in taking the course he has now taken.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he must ask the permission of the House to make one or two quotations from previous speeches delivered from the Treasury Bench with regard to this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said, on the 20th of May last—

"It had been asked why the subject had not been mentioned in the Queen's Speech; but he might observe . . . that it was not usual to make mention in the gracious Speech from the Throne of any measures which it was not intended to bring forward in the Session which that Speech opened, and the Government would have been departing from the practical manner in which legislation ought to be, and generally was, conducted in that House if Her Majesty were advised to hint at measures with which it was not intended to proceed."

Would not that lead anyone to suppose that this clause, which, in his (Mr. Chaplin's) judgment, was in reality a

new Irish Land Act, was one of those measures with which the Government did not intend to proceed? He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman would reconcile it with the following sentence, in which he said—

"The Land Question was not only one which was most important, but one with which its very importance made it exceedingly difficult to deal in a comprehensive manner. To have brought in a 10 minutes' Irish Land Bill would, in his opinion, have been a most unwise course to adopt. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) said they might bring forward an interim Bill for the suspension of payment of rent. [Mr. T. P. O'Connor: No; suspension of eviction.] He thought that was almost the same thing. He was quite prepared to listen to any arguments which the hon. Member by whom such a Bill was brought in might advance. He had no desire to prejudge the question; but would any hon. Member on either side of the House suppose that it would not bring in its discussion, if brought forward by the Government, every branch of the Land Question?"—[3 Hansard, cclii. 155-6-7.]

No; and he supposed if the right hon. Member had given Notice to introduce a Bill to transfer the property of the landlords of Ireland bodily to the tenants he would not in the least prejudge the question, and would have told the hon. Member that he was ready to listen to any arguments that he might advance. That was exactly his case. The Government had, as he contended, introduced such a Bill, and it was absolutely necessary that every branch of this important question should be discussed. It was impossible, however, for the House of Commons at six hours' notice to discuss properly a subject of such tremendous importance.

MR. W. E. FORSTER rose to a point of Order. He understood the hon. Gentleman to state that there ought to be an adjournment, because he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had given Notice of his intention to propose a clause in Committee. The hon. Member said time ought to be given for the discussion of that clause. He rose in Order to ask whether, inasmuch as the clause was not in the Bill at present, and as only Notice had been given that it would be brought forward in Committee, it was in Order to discuss that clause on the second reading of the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER said, public Notice having been given on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to introduce a clause of that character, and such a

who had received it, how much of those two-thirds had probably reached the hands of the people who were in want of bread? Works of improvement, which were easily undertaken by owners of land in Ireland, required a considerable expenditure in skilled labour and material. Iron, timber, Portland cement, lime, drainage tiles, and so forth, had to be purchased; masons, carpenters, slaters, and other skilled mechanics had to be employed, and paid high wages. It would not, therefore, be an unreasonable assumption to state that of £180,000 expended by the landlords, not more than half, or £90,000, had as yet been expended in wages for unskilled labour. Of the £90,000 it would be a very liberal assumption to say that, up to the present time, only one-half had been applied to the relief of the people who were in actual distress. These relief works were scattered all over the country. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had stated that of the numerous applications made by landlords in the scheduled districts only 63 had been refused. They might, then, fairly assume, from information which he (Mr. Parnell) had received from those who had a knowledge of the facts, that the works set on foot were not, so far, at any rate, as the majority of them were concerned, in localities where distressed persons could obtain employment. Therefore, he was fully justified in reducing the sum to one-half—namely to £45,000. There was another objection to the principle of granting money to owners of land apart entirely from the uselessness of the application, so far as the relief of actual distress was concerned. Landowners in many cases used the money lent to them as a leverage to obtain the payment of rents from their tenants. It was worked in this way—the tenants who could not pay rent were, he had heard, informed that unless they paid it no works of improvement would be executed on their farms; and those tenants who did pay were favoured in comparison with those who could not pay, and if the latter were employed they were told that they would have to give back in the shape of rent the money they received for their labour.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should like to have an authentic instance of this brought under his notice.

MR. PARNELL said, he was speaking generally of scheduled districts, and he could not then give particular instances. It was obvious that one of the chief designs of the late Government was not to relieve the distressed, but to relieve landlords who could not obtain their rents with the same celerity as formerly they could. He had no doubt that the leverage had been used and would be used again to a considerable extent. A further objection to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government was, that this sum of £750,000 was to be taken out of the Irish Church Fund. That application he considered to be in direct contradiction of the statute, as that fund was the only one which was available for many purposes in Ireland. It was exceedingly hard that the Government should seize upon that fund to provide against the consequences of an occurrence which was the result of the neglect of Parliament in years past. They might fairly ask, what was the necessity for such an appropriation of the fund? The security for the repayment of the sum to be advanced was unimpeachable. All former loans for the improvement of Irish land had been duly repaid; and why, therefore, should not this loan be advanced by the Imperial Exchequer, and the Irish Church Fund be left for purposes which might obtain the sanction of the majority of the Irish constituencies? Then, again, the Church Commissioners had no capital—they had only an annual income, and in order to make advances were obliged to borrow—sometimes from the Savings' Banks. In this case he understood they would have to borrow from the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. The money was to be borrowed at 3½ per cent, and was to be lent to the landowners at 1 per cent, so that there would be an annual loss to the fund of 2½ per cent, and that for a period of 37 years would amount to £250,000. If they agreed to take the money from the Imperial Exchequer, would it not be a fair and generous thing at least to lend the money at the same rate as it was proposed that it should be borrowed? He believed the calculated surplus of the Irish Church Fund was only about £4,000,000 at the present time, and the proposed charge of £1,500,000 would reduce it to £2,500,000. It was, therefore, obvious that the utility of the fund, of Lancaster, in one of the numerous speeches he delivered during the Recess, when he insisted that Ireland must be dealt with with more desperate determination. He (Mr. Chaplin) thought at that time, having regard to the condition of Ireland and the state of the people, that this was a most unwise and dangerous, not to say a criminal explanation of policy. [Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member has applied an expression of that kind to a Member of this House he is clearly out of Order.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that he should withdraw the expression instantly if the House was under the impression that he used it. What he said was, "Not to say criminal" ["Oh, oh!"]; but he withdrew the expression at once. He could scarcely find Parliamentary expressions to convey the feelings with which he read that statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought it most foolish, most unwise, and probably one of the most dangerous statements which a person in the right hon. Gentleman's position could have made. Were they to consider this clause as merely a prelude to one of those drastic measures to which the right hon. Gentleman referred? He thought they were entitled to an explicit assurance from the Government on that point. What was the state of Ireland at this moment? Again he would quote the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who, speaking at Birmingham on the 24th of January last, said—

"In the West of Ireland, in the Province of Connaught, you find there is something like a general social revolt. Rents are refused to be paid even by tenants who could pay them, and this course is recommended and encouraged by a multitude of persons."

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"The revolt is really against the proprietors: but it is also against the tenants. If a tenant pays rent he comes under the condemnation of his brother tenants; and if a tenant be evicted and a farm vacant, and some other farmer enters upon the occupation of that farm, his peace and even his life are in danger."

That was a description of the condition of Ireland after 10 years' experience of Liberal legislation. It was because he felt that they were about to be asked to enter upon a similar course of legislation, with similar disastrous results, and at only six hours' notice, that he most sincerely trusted a majority of hon. Members on both sides would support the Amendment he should conclude by moving—namely, that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. RITCHIE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, there is a question of difficulty, upon which I should be glad to be enlightened by you, in perfectly clear terms, with a view of practically settling the question which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Chaplin) seeks to raise. The hon. Gentleman moves an adjournment of the debate, and his reason for making that Motion is, that he has had only six hours' Notice of a certain clause. [MR. CHAPLIN: I said it had been distributed only that time.] The hon. Gentleman said many times over—though, perhaps, he is not aware of it—that of this clause only six hours' Notice had been given. Upon that the hon. Member moves the adjournment of the debate; but what I am in some doubt about is whether, if we should adjourn the debate and then proceed on a future day to consider the second reading of the Bill, we shall be in Order in debating the clause as if it were part of the Bill. If I am to understand that when we proceed to the second reading we may debate, as part of the subject-matter of the second reading, the question of the clause which my right hon. Friend intends to propose in Committee, then I can understand it; but upon that, as a point of procedure, I should be thankful to be enlightened by your authority.

MR. SPEAKER: It seems to me that a most unusual course has been taken with regard to this clause. Before the Bill has been read a second time public Notice is given of the intention to move a new clause, and the clause itself is printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the House. It appears to me that, that having been done, it is impossible the debate on the second reading of the Bill can be carried out properly without reference to the clause. I quite admit that the usual course in debating the second reading of a Bill is not to refer to the clauses; but in this case, Notice having been given of such an important new clause, the House will be prevented from discussing the Bill properly, unless some reference is made to it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought it might be convenient to the House if he said a few words. For reasons which he was ready at the proper time to explain, he thought it right to propose that clause in the Bill, which would be the most convenient place, and he gave Notice of it as soon as he came to that conclusion, believing it would be for the convenience of hon. Members. He supposed at the time—but now found he was mistaken—that the debate would be confined to the Bill before the House, because the second reading, which was asked for, could only be the second reading of the Bill; therefore, the vote for or against the second reading would only be for what was in the Bill. Now, however, he was informed that the Speaker thought it would be impossible to prevent the debate extending to the clause; and, as the clause was not really before them, no vote could be taken upon it; and, therefore, he thought that what the Speaker said must happen would subject them to the inconvenience of debating matters on which they could not vote. That being the case, though he thought it a public inconvenience, he rose for the purpose of saying that, under the circumstances, he should not persevere with the clause in question, but should embody the substance of it in a separate Bill, which he would ask the House to pass at a later day.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that in consequence of the statement and action of the Chief Secretary for Ireland he would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, he confessed that he did not see how they could discuss the question of the relief of distress in Ireland within the narrow limits now proposed to be assigned to it by the Bill now before the House. In the judgment of all those who had lived longest in Ireland, and had most carefully considered the condition of the people of that country, it always had been apparent that the main cause of periodical

famines there was the condition of Irish land tenure. It would, therefore, be a matter of practical impossibility for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, by the adoption of the course which he had now announced—namely, the withdrawal of the clause, Notice of which the right hon. Gentleman had given a day or two ago, to limit the discussion of the question within the very narrow limits he proposed. It would be his (Mr. Parnell's) duty to move certain clauses which would put the question of this distress in Ireland upon its proper footing before the country. They had too long been told that distress in Ireland proceeded from the laziness and want of thrift of the Irish people. They had been too long in the habit of appearing before the nations of the world as beggars for charity; and there were many people—in fact, the majority of the people of Ireland—who now thought that the time had come when this practice should cease, and that they should have the opportunity of living in their own country, and of obtaining prosperity from the natural riches and resources of the country—an opportunity which the laws of England had denied them for so long a period. What was wanted by the Irish people was not so much that they should be relieved from the necessities produced by famine out of Imperial funds as that they should be put in a position to manage their own business by an Irish Parliament, instead of being subject, as was the case under the last Parliament, to alien legislation. What was the Bill of the present Government? It was a Bill which simply sought to carry out the policy of the Predecessors of the present Government—a policy which consigned 250,000 people to death by starvation. What were the steps taken by the late Government? The House would recollect that distress in Ireland had been predicted by those best acquainted with the circumstances of the country, and publicly predicted during the last 12 months. It was in the May of 1879 that public attention first came to be directed to the probability—the extreme probability—that the wet season would produce suffering in many of the Western portions of Ireland. These complaints were made publicly, and how were they answered by the late Government? He found that up to January the only answer given by the Government to the pressing needs of the country was the arrest of Mr. Michael Davitt and others upon the trumped-up charge of sedition—a charge which in the ordinary course of law the Government should have prosecuted; but in this instance they shrank from doing so. It was not until the middle of November, 1879, that the Treasury on the application of the Lord Lieutenant, authorized the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to lend money to owners of land, or, in other words, it was not until the middle of November that the Government took the first step to stave off the distress, which was then in full swing. They issued a Circular under date of 22nd November, and on the 12th of January, 1880, there was a fresh Notice amending the former one, and offering loans on still more favourable conditions. These loans were offered to landlords and to sanitary authorities for the execution of works of employment, and also for the purpose of executing works which sanitary authorities could execute under the Acts authorizing their existence. It was now found by the Report just issued by the Dublin Mansion House Committee, the chief charitable association in Ireland, that the net result of all the exertions of the late and of the present Governments had been the employment of 15,000 people on works of relief out of 500,000 who were in want. And at what expenditure was this infinitesimal result arrived at? The Act of last Session authorized a loan out of the Irish Church Fund of £750,000. The whole of that loan had been drawn out—nay, more, it had been largely exceeded, so that the present Government were obliged to come to Parliament for fresh powers, by which they sought by the Bill under notice to make an additional advance of £750,000, notwithstanding that the whole of the loan authorized by the Act of last Session had been largely exceeded. It was found that up to the present the result was that employment had only been found for 15,000 out of 500,000 persons who were in want. Such a fact alone was sufficient to condemn the Bill now before the House; and if they really wanted to relieve distress in Ireland they must go further than the limit of the Bill proposed. The chief provisions of the present measure were (1), the advance by the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners of another £750,000 for the purposes of loans to the owners of land in Ireland; (2), power was given to the Commissioners of Public Works, with the consent of the Treasury, to make loans to railway and other public Companies having borrowing powers, upon the security of baronial guarantees given by extraordinary presentment sessions; and (3), a small grant was to be given of £30,000 for fishery piers. With regard to the proposal of doubling the grant to the owners of land in Ireland, he failed to find the slightest justification for such a course as regarded the ostensible purpose of the Bill—the relief of distress in Ireland. He failed to see on what grounds the Government now came to ask Parliament for a fresh application of £750,000 for such a useless undertaking. If the Government had shown that the application of the money already spent was of any advantage, or that any appreciable portion of it had reached those who were really in distress, he could then have understood their contention; or if they had been able to show that any proportion of the money which they now asked from Parliament was likely to reach the really destitute, he could understand their application; but as the Government had not professed that this money was to be used for the relief of distress, or that a very small and almost appreciable portion of it was likely to be applied for that purpose, he thought the House would not be doing its duty if it sanctioned the diversion of money for such an object. By the latest information—they had not, however, received very late information on the subject from the Chief Secretary for Ireland—it appeared that about £250,000 had been issued to owners of land in Ireland. How much of that sum had probably reached the persons who were in distress? They could not assume that out of £250,000 issued in that way more than two-thirds or one-half had actually been expended, because it was obvious that the expenditure of a sum of money for that purpose must take a considerable time. But assuming that two-thirds of £250,000, which was a very liberal estimate, had been actually expended by the landlords who had received it, how much of those two-thirds had probably reached the hands of the people who were in want of bread? Works of improvement, which were easily undertaken by owners of land in Ireland, required a considerable expenditure in skilled labour and material. Iron, timber, Portland cement, lime, drainage tiles, and so forth, had to be purchased; masons, carpenters, slaters, and other skilled mechanics had to be employed, and paid high wages. It would not, therefore, be an unreasonable assumption to state that of £180,000 expended by the landlords, not more than half, or £90,000, had as yet been expended in wages for unskilled labour. Of the £90,000 it would be a very liberal assumption to say that, up to the present time, only one-half had been applied to the relief of the people who were in actual distress. These relief works were scattered all over the country. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had stated that of the numerous applications made by landlords in the scheduled districts only 63 had been refused. They might, then, fairly assume, from information which he (Mr. Parnell) had received from those who had a knowledge of the facts, that the works set on foot were not, so far, at any rate, as the majority of them were concerned, in localities where distressed persons could obtain employment. Therefore, he was fully justified in reducing the sum to one-half—namely to £45,000. There was another objection to the principle of granting money to owners of land apart entirely from the uselessness of the application, so far as the relief of actual distress was concerned. Landowners in many cases used the money lent to them as a leverage to obtain the payment of rents from their tenants. It was worked in this way—the tenants who could not pay rent were, he had heard, informed that unless they paid it no works of improvement would be executed on their farms; and those tenants who did pay were favoured in comparison with those who could not pay, and if the latter were employed they were told that they would have to give back in the shape of rent the money they received for their labour.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he should like to have an authentic instance of this brought under his notice.

MR. PARNELL said, he was speaking generally of scheduled districts, and he could not then give particular instances. It was obvious that one of the chief designs of the late Government was not to relieve the distressed, but to relieve landlords who could not obtain their rents with the same celerity as formerly they could. He had no doubt that the leverage had been used and would be used again to a considerable extent. A further objection to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government was, that this sum of £750,000 was to be taken out of the Irish Church Fund. That application he considered to be in direct contradiction of the statute, as that fund was the only one which was available for many purposes in Ireland. It was exceedingly hard that the Government should seize upon that fund to provide against the consequences of an occurrence which was the result of the neglect of Parliament in years past. They might fairly ask, what was the necessity for such an appropriation of the fund? The security for the repayment of the sum to be advanced was unimpeachable. All former loans for the improvement of Irish land had been duly repaid; and why, therefore, should not this loan be advanced by the Imperial Exchequer, and the Irish Church Fund be left for purposes which might obtain the sanction of the majority of the Irish constituencies? Then, again, the Church Commissioners had no capital—they had only an annual income, and in order to make advances were obliged to borrow—sometimes from the Savings' Banks. In this case he understood they would have to borrow from the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. The money was to be borrowed at 3½ per cent, and was to be lent to the landowners at 1 per cent, so that there would be an annual loss to the fund of 2½ per cent, and that for a period of 37 years would amount to £250,000. If they agreed to take the money from the Imperial Exchequer, would it not be a fair and generous thing at least to lend the money at the same rate as it was proposed that it should be borrowed? He believed the calculated surplus of the Irish Church Fund was only about £4,000,000 at the present time, and the proposed charge of £1,500,000 would reduce it to £2,500,000. It was, therefore, obvious that the utility of the fund, in any future emergency, was very much impaired. It appeared to him that the ultimate loss to the fund would be avoided by the course he suggested; and he had reason to believe that the matter was so important that if a concession were made on that point, the opposition to the Government proposals would, he believed, be very much diminished. The next provision of the Bill was one by which power was given to the Commissioners of Public Works, with the consent of the Treasury, to make loans to Railway Companies and other Companies in having borrowing powers on the security of baronial guarantees obtained at extraordinary presentment sessions. That clause might shortly be described as the railway clause of the Bill; and he could not imagine how the Chief Secretary for Ireland could have been induced to pitchfork, so to speak, these clauses into the Bill if he had given the subject proper consideration. Under the present law, Railway Companies, before coming to Parliament for their Bills, were entitled to apply to baronial sessions for a guarantee. Up to 1874 the presentment of baronial sessions and the fiat of a Grand Jury were the only conditions requisite for the purpose of obtaining a guarantee; but in 1874 the House of Commons, in order to prevent the misuse of the grants, and to provide certain local checks and guarantees against jobbery, adopted a Standing Order by which the consent of as many local bodies as possible should be obtained before the Railway Companies could get a guarantee, and in addition to the baronial presentment, it became necessary that the consent of a Board of Guardians should be obtained before the guarantee could be granted. Thus they had, first of all, the check provided by the necessary consent of the Board of Guardians; secondly, the presentment of the baronial sessions of the associated cesspayers; third, the Grand Jury finding; and fourth, the power possessed by the rate and cesspayers to traverse the presentment before a Judge at Assizes. Thus there were four distinct checks provided by the Legislature in order to prevent abuse; and, although they had been found insufficient for their purpose, yet the clauses of the right hon. Gentleman proposed to sweep away those checks at one blow, and to introduce a variety of other changes by the proposed clauses.

Mr. Parnell

The Lord Lieutenant could call an extraordinary presentment sessions, and then a Railway Company which had previously failed in obtaining its baronial guarantee, which had gone before Parliament and obtained its Acts, and had been granted powers on condition that the whole of its capital should be subscribed, and one-half of it paid up, could now come forward and obtain a baronial guarantee without any check or hindrance from the extraordinary baronial presentment sessions convened by the Lord Lieutenant, and without having to fulfil any of the conditions provided by the Legislature as to capital. In other words, the Company, which had been unable to obtain its presentment before, and which had been unable to obtain a 6*d.* of capital or even its expense, could come forward and levy black mail by casting itself on the unprotected ratepayers, and obtain a guarantee for its own advantage and benefit. Before he left the Railway Companies he wanted to point out that the power which was to be granted by the Legislature might act in a very unexpected manner, and in a way not at all intended by the promoters of the Bill. There was nothing in the clauses as they at present stood to prevent any of the great Railway Companies in Ireland, such as the Great Southern and Western, the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway, the Midland, Great Northern, and others, with plenty of means for obtaining capital for the prosecution of any work which was likely to pay—there was nothing to prevent them from enlarging their resources by obtaining baronial guarantee under the provisions of the Bill for the maintaining a branch line which could not possibly pay directly, but which might be of indirect value to the line, and which might act as a feeder to traffic on the main line, but be a work which, at present, and for all time hereafter, would necessarily be a burden on the ratepayers. With respect to the interest on the capital raised in the construction of the works, there were many branch lines which could be made which would be very useful to the main line, and which would probably pay indirectly, but which would never pay back directly any portion of the capital used in their construction; and there was nothing in the clause to prevent Companies such as those he had described from obtaining

But if they attempted to deal with it by means of measures which were not real and thorough they would find themselves greatly mistaken. As to the Bill, he hoped the House would get into Committee upon it as soon as possible, and endeavour to amend it. In that case, he had no doubt the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give his earnest attention to any suggestion that might proceed from Irish Gentlemen.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, that there was no one more anxious than he was that the tenantry of Ireland should be assisted by the Government to purchase their holdings when those holdings were in the market, and the subject was one which would, he hoped, engage the attention of the Government. He would not oppose the Bill, and was extremely pleased to hear that, as he now apprehended, the Motion for its rejection had only been made in order to have a discussion upon the measure. The objections, as he understood, to the Bill were: first, that "the more" was taken from the Irish Church Fund; secondly, that too great facilities were given to lend money to landlords; and, thirdly, that the money was not going with sufficient speed into the hands of the people who required it. For his own part, he saw no objection to dealing with the Irish Church Fund for the purpose; indeed, he thought it could not be put to a use that was less of Party character and more of a national one than that of clothing the naked and feeding the hungry, although he was aware that there were thousands of persons by whom such a proposal would be opposed. As to money being lent to the landlords, he would merely observe that he did not sit in that House as the nominee of the landlords, while, at the same time, he had some difficulty in seeing to whom else it was to be lent in the districts where distress prevailed, inasmuch as they were, in all probability, the only persons who could give the necessary security for its repayment. He wished, however, that the Government might be able to see its way to lending money direct to the tenant farmers; and he was sure that and other matters would receive the best attention of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, the announcement of whose appointment to his present Office he had hailed with unalloyed pleasure, and who, he hoped, when he went over to that country in the autumn, would not forget to pay a visit to the North.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the avowed object of the Bill was to prevent distress; but, if there should be further distress, consequent upon failures of that year's crops, neither the last Bill, nor this Bill, would be adequate to deal with it. If there should be another failure of crops, he hoped the present Government would not follow the example of their Predecessors in postponing its consideration, but would summon Parliament to deliberation upon it. But, as far as they were then concerned, they had only to deal with the distress until the harvest was reached. He asked, therefore, whether the provisions of the Bill were adequately sufficient to meet the distress during the next three or four months; would the money be spent usefully; and, was the machinery of supply a proper one? His opinion was that the provisions of the Bill calling for another £750,000 from the Irish Church Fund were not well and economically calculated to meet the distress for the next few months. These clauses had been on the Statute Book for a considerable time, and before they were on the Statute Book the Executive Government had obtained certain powers, and yet it was on charitable donations all over the world that the Irish people had to depend. The former Act, of which this Bill was a continuation, did not effectually relieve distress. Out of the £750,000 then voted, only £180,000 had found its way out of the Treasury into the pockets of the landlords, and of the latter sum, not more than a third or a fourth had actually reached the pockets of the people who were intended to be employed when the £750,000 was voted. Further than that, he had seen distressed districts that were scheduled where the people were on the point of dying, in which no money was asked for by the landlords. He thought the system which had been followed was useless. It was often the case that in one parish, where, perhaps, there was no landlord, people were starving; while, in an adjoining parish, works were going on, not, indeed, useless works, but works which employed persons who were not in dire distress, and were carried on simply for the improvement of the property on which they laboured. It seemed have to guarantee in all cases one-fourth of the excess expenditure. That was a proposition which he felt sure very few of them would feel inclined to accede to. There were a number of other objections to the details of the Bill which would, however, be best used in Committee; and, therefore, he proposed to pass them. Finally, the Canadian and Liverpool Fund granted £15,000 towards the fishery piers, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland only proposed to grant double that amount, namely—£30,000. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to carry out his avowed intention he would have to grant at least £45,000. The amount mentioned was altogether illusory, because Ireland had received nothing for a number of years from Parliament towards the erection of the fishery piers. Since the Union Scotland had received over £1,000,000 in grants in aid of fisheries, while during the last six years Ireland had received nothing at all; while he was informed that if the miserable pittance of £30,000, which had been mentioned, was granted, nothing more would be given for the next five years; in fact, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had set his bait with the little sprat of £30,000 in order to catch the magnificent mackerel of £750,000. For his own part, he (Mr. Parnell) felt disposed to leave the money in the hands of the Treasury. He did not intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but it seemed to him that it would be the duty of the Irish Members to try every possible way to amend it in Committee. At present it was practically a sham Bill. It did not fulfil the object it had in view—namely, the relief of distress in Ireland. It did not touch it. If they voted the money asked for, neither the £750,000 nor the £450,000 would reach the people for the next six months, which was when they wanted it most. He thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland had really underestimated the magnitude of the distress. He thought there would be a good harvest. He was sure he (Mr. Parnell) hoped there would be a good harvest; but not one good harvest, nor two good harvests, would remove the pressure in Ireland. The potato crop was, he was glad to say, doing very well, and it appeared to be one of the best that had been in Ireland for many years; but, at the same time, he must say the real suffering was due not so much to the failure of the potato crop in the past as to other causes. The distressed districts were generally those in the West of Ireland, where there were a large number of small holdings—little strips of land—and the tenants of those places were more in the position of labourers than that of farmers. There were about 150,000 of these holdings. Those men had been in the habit of going to England and Scotland and working for the farmers there in times of distress; but, owing to the state of manufacture in England, the urban population of England had been driven to the country, and had taken the employment which used to be taken up by the Irish tenants. The consequence of that was that those men had scraped up every farthing of money to go to England in search of work, and when they got there they were utterly unable to obtain it. It was a great mistake to suppose that the poorer classes lived now, as they did before the Famine, entirely on potatoes. They lived far more upon Indian meal, which it required money to buy, as it required money also to pay their rents; and even if they had a good harvest the landlords might step in and seize the crops for the rent. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would not prevent that. He did not agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) that the Irish Members could throw their responsibility upon the Government. The constituencies of Ireland had made the greatest sacrifices to return them; and if they threw their responsibility on the Government the constituencies would be deeply and bitterly disappointed. Therefore it would be their duty on that and any future stage of the Bill to point out its utter unsuitableness for its ostensible purpose, and to show the Government how they could meet the distress, which was still of great intensity. He proposed, when the Bill reached the Committee, to ask the House to assign the £750,000, which was intended by the Bill to go to the owners of land, instead of that to assign it to Boards of Guardians in Ireland, thus enabling them to lend money directly to occupiers willing to improve their land. He felt convinced that in no other way could they have the slightest hope of rescuing 500,000 of the Irish peasantry from the last stage of pauperism. In no other way could they check pauperism and emigration, which in time people of Ireland had a strong claim for a grant from the Imperial Treasury in aid of the distress. They had received grants from Canada and from the Government of the United States, and he believed from the free Federal Chambers of several of those States. He wanted to know whether this Imperial Parliament, having on its shoulders the responsibility for the state of things now existing in Ireland, was going to refuse that at the present time? If anything was wanted to show that the Government saw that responsibility, it was that during the last few days they had signified their intention of proposing to restrain the unjust power of the landlord of evicting his tenants, and of treating the provision as a measure of relieving distress in Ireland.

MR. FINDLATER suggested that, instead of raising frivolous objections as to the utility or inutility of the Bill, and attributing laches to the late Government in regard to measures for relieving the distress in Ireland, hon. Members would do better service to the country by reserving their thoughts for Committee, and endeavouring there to make the best they could of the measure.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. FINDLATER, proceeding with his remarks, strongly urged that this was not the occasion for lengthened debate on points of detail, or on matters which were practically beyond the range of the Bill, and that further discussion should be reserved for Committee; that, at any rate, Members should confine themselves as much as possible to suggesting Amendments to which in Committee effect might be given. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had shown a sincere desire to forward the interests of the Irish people; and he would, no doubt, give any such suggestions his best consideration. With regard to objections which had been taken as to what was called subsidizing the landlords, he thought that some of them might be obviated by inserting in the Bill provisions which would insure that the money advanced should be spent within a reasonable time and in a proper way. It might also be possible by some provisions in the Bill to accelerate the action of the Board of Works and the Treasury in regard to advances of money; but those were matters which could best be considered in Committee. In any case, care ought to be taken to give relief as far as possible in the form of employment, so as to avoid the demoralizing consequences of eleemosynary aid. He regretted that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) did not agree to the second reading of the Bill, to which, for his own part, in the absence of any better scheme, he (Mr. Findlater) should give his most earnest support.

MR. LEA said, that, representing one of the counties which had suffered most, he must say that he did not regard the Bill as a very practical measure, or one which would be completely effectual for the relief of distress in Ireland, which, indeed, could not be completely accomplished by any system of relief that could be devised. That might have been done by the late Government if the proper measures had been taken for that purpose six months ago; but the present Bill could only be looked to as a means of affording relief by giving the people the opportunity of earning wages. He was of opinion that if anything effectual was to be done to prevent distress in the future, it would be necessary to reform the existing wretched system of county government, which was antiquated and altogether useless for any practical purpose; and he hoped that some measure dealing with that subject would be introduced next Session. With regard to handing over all the money to the landlords, a course to which exception had been taken by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), he (Mr. Lea) was himself of opinion that it would be better if half of it were handed over to the tenants, and any provision to that effect would receive his cordial support. He represented a county in which there was hardly a railway at all, and distress existed chiefly in that part of the county which was furthest away from railways. What greater benefit could be given to his county, and to other counties in a similar condition as to railways, than a promotion of the railway system? He did not see, therefore, why powers in that respect should not be given to the Boards of Guardians as well as to baronial sessions—the former being the more representative of the two bodies.

ment took power to distribute another £750,000, looking to what might occur in the immediate future. He also thought it would be well to associate another Gentleman with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to act as trustees of this money. He was quite sure that there were many hon. Gentlemen in Ireland who would give their time and take the trouble freely and willingly in order to see that the money was properly applied. If this was done, there would be no suspicion in the mind of anyone that the funds were thrown away. He fully agreed in the suggestion that had been thrown out by the hon. Gentleman opposite, which was similar to that which he moved during the last Session—namely, that money should also be given to the tenant farmers for draining and improving their land. He urged this point upon the Government, and also brought it before the House; but he was sorry to say that the then Government would not look at it for a moment. He pressed the matter upon the present Government, as he was convinced it would do great deal of good. It would have given the working class and the farmers a feeling that something was being done for them. It would have given them some sense of independence, and it would have been very easy to carry it out. Boards of Guardians could have supplied the machinery for collecting it, and they would have guaranteed the security of the money, so that there would have been no possible loss to the fund. A good many people in Ireland were feeling that this Government was doing something for the tenant farmers. Although this money did not go into the landlord's pocket, but went through his pocket, there was still a suspicion in the minds of a good many that the landlord would get a good deal for himself. As to having the £750,000 out of the Public Exchequer, he should be glad to get double as much out of the Public Exchequer if he could; but he was afraid there was not much chance of that. He must say that, looking at the whole question, he thought the manner in which the late Government had acted in this matter had been most niggardly—they refused to lay any part of the burden on Imperial funds. That, he believed, had a very injurious effect in Ireland. They could only secure the goodwill of the people of Ireland by treating them generously as well as fairly. He felt there was great cause to complain of the want of generosity towards Ireland. They might depend upon it that they could only get the goodwill of the people by treating them generously as well as fairly. They had a great deal of cause to complain of want of generosity on the part of the English Government towards Ireland. The industries of the country were crippled. Their property seemed to be wasting away, and he did not see much probability of improvement if the present management of Irish affairs continued. A wise thing to do would be to place £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 in the hands of a small commission of Irish gentlemen to lend, in order to foster industry in the country. They could not possibly have a people satisfied and contented if they saw no means of earning a reasonable livelihood without emigrating to America. He had not the slightest doubt that it would be a wise thing for the Government in some way to give more freedom and elasticity to the power of borrowing money on public works in Ireland. He also thought that sufficient precautions were not included in the present Bill. In many Acts that he was acquainted with in which guarantees were asked for railways every precaution was taken; and if such precautions were not put into this Bill with regard to railways, that could not be put into force at all, because it was supposed by this Bill that the Railway Companies had got their Acts. For instance, power of appointing arbitrators and various other powers were always given; and if this Bill went into Committee he thought it would be very wise to insert similar provisions. A shilling rate for railways—one-half to be paid by landlords and the other by the tenant—would absolutely raise the value of the land and be a great benefit to the tenant. If they looked at the expenditure of public money in Ireland, they must be struck with the immense inequality between that country and England. In Ireland there was hardly anything occurring in the way of out trade. Now, it was the duty of Government to look to this part of their duty, and to make the Irish feel that the Government now in Office were different to the late Government, and that they intended to bring about a very different state of things in that country. He believed Government were anxious to do their best.

But if they attempted to deal with it by means of measures which were not real and thorough they would find themselves greatly mistaken. As to the Bill, he hoped the House would get into Committee upon it as soon as possible, and endeavour to amend it. In that case, he had no doubt the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give his earnest attention to any suggestion that might proceed from Irish Gentlemen.

Further than that, he had seen distressed districts that were scheduled where the people were on the point of dying, in which no money was asked for by the landlords. He thought the system which had been followed was useless. It was often the case that in one parish, where, perhaps, there was no landlord, people were starving; while, in an adjoining parish, works were going on, not, indeed, useless works, but works which employed persons who were not in dire distress, and were carried on simply for the improvement of the property on which they laboured. It seemed to him, therefore, that the system which they were called on to continue had failed in its main object of relieving distress, and that where the people were threatened with poverty and starvation such legislation was not adequate to save them from such a calamity. What, then, was the true direction of legislation? The right hon. Gentleman had discovered it at the eleventh hour. It was to save the small holders of land, during the trying time that had come upon them, from eviction, and to enable them to use the little money they had earned to find food, and not to turn them completely into paupers. He (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) was afraid it was almost too late to do so now. If, three or four years ago, they had a firm hold given them on their tenancies, he believed that, even in that short space of time, the spirit of industry would have been so roused that they would have had better hearts to meet distress; and, if it were done at once, it would do more to nerve them against what was to come than anything else that could be done, or had been done hitherto. It was not necessary to point out the connection between this and the relief of distress, for the Government had seen it, and had remembered it in this Bill. If the people were obliged to hoard their money to pay their rent they would be starved, no matter what amount of money was given to the landlords. If there was any security that the money handed to the landlord at so low a rate of interest would not be made the machinery of exacting from the occupiers of the land a higher rate of interest, he should not quarrel with the low rate of interest; but he complained that the landlord got money at 1 per cent, and would be able to charge the tenant 5 per cent, if he chose, on the outlay of the money on the land. The only way to meet this was to give the tenant a fair tenure of his land, and protection against the undue raising of his rent. They did not know how far the sum now called for was wanted; they did not know the nature of the improvements sought to be effected; and they could not say with anything like accuracy what had gone to this or that scheduled Union. The evidence had not been printed, and until it was printed there were no clear facts to judge from. In the end the burden of this distress would fall on the ratepayers of Ireland. The true remedy, and the only one which the Government had left to them at that moment, was to grant out of the Imperial Treasury a sum to relieve the ratepayers of Ireland of the heavy rates they would have to pay to meet the distress. He again said that this distress would not have arisen if there had been proper land tenure in Ireland; and it was because all demands of such tenure had been refused that this burden would fall on the ratepayers. He, therefore, had a just claim to come to the House to get some assistance from Imperial taxation. If there had been a fair land tenure the men on whom the distress had fallen would have something laid by against a rainy day, and would not be in the miserable position in which they were; and if then they had had one or two bad seasons, they would not have been worse than the occupiers in other countries, where the Land Laws were better, and who had been able to lay by something. He believed, therefore, the Bill would do very little good in the direction in which it was addressed—the relief of distress. He believed the landlords might make the power obtained under the Bill an instrument of extortion. The clause which referred to railways must be very narrow indeed in its operation. He understood it would not apply to the relaying of rails, but only to Railway Companies which had works authorized but not constructed. Before they legislated at all in this direction, he thought they were entitled to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the names of the railways which could make use of the powers of the Bill. Again, unless a railway really ran through the heart of a distressed district, it would not do much to relieve the distress; for if the people had to go miles to their work they would prefer to go on out-door relief, and he should think they would be quite right. A further question would arise whether the money so spent would be economically spent. They had not to consider whether landlord or tenant would be benefited by improvements, or whether railways would be made, but whether the people who wanted bread or fuel would get it. He did not look with much approval on the railway clause, and he should expect to see laid on the Table a list of the railways to which it would be applicable. He thought the

be advanced to landlords for drainage and other improvement works, that being considered the best way of meeting the distress. The Government, however, were disappointed to find that the terms on which this money was offered did not attract the landlords; and on the 12th of January following another and a more liberal notice was issued, offering money without any interest for the first two years and at 1 per cent afterwards. No one objected to that when the House met in February, and the result was that a large sum was applied for. The second notice had, perhaps, succeeded too well; and now complaint was made that the amount borrowed by the landlords, £1,250,000, was too large. But who was responsible for that? The question was not one of Party; and as everyone in the last Parliament was responsible for the offer, Her Majesty's present Government had felt themselves bound to provide funds with which to carry out the offer made by the late Government, sanctioned by the last Parliament, such offer being also one which the landowners were perfectly entitled to accept, regarding it purely from the point of view of their own interests. It was all very well to say that the landowners, as compared with tenants, should not be allowed to make profit out of the offer of the Government; and, as far as he knew, there was no wish on the part of the Government that any such profit should be made. But he also saw no reason why a scheme which seemed just should not be carried fully into effect, though it had been brought before Parliament and carried by a previous Administration, with, of course, different views on questions of general politics. There had been no concealment about the matter. It had been openly and fully discussed, and when it was under discussion it was described by several of the Irish Members as an admirable measure. The statute then passed confirmed the offer of the 12th January, and all loans made under it; and was it not the duty of the present Government to see that the engagements so made to the landlords were kept, and that the money promised to them should be forthcoming? That was the explanation he had to give for the 1st clause of that Bill.

MR. PARNELL: I am asking what amount of loans was sanctioned up to the time the late Government went out of Office?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): The amount must be practically the same as now, because all the applications had to be made before a certain date—namely, the 29th February. It was to meet the demands of those who thus applied for loans that this large sum was now required. The present Government when they came into power found that about £1,250,000 had been applied for. It would not be just or right for them to attempt, under the pretence of not sanctioning loans, to keep down the amount. But not only had the amount he had stated been applied for, but it had been actually sanctioned before the present Government came into Office; and all that remained for them was to keep faith with those whose applications had thus been made and sanctioned. The matter was practically one of contract entered into by the late Parliament with the landlords; and he thought hon. Gentlemen would feel that contract must be honestly kept. Passing on to what the present Government had introduced into the Bill for the purpose of affording additional relief of distress, he (Mr. Law) might perhaps be permitted to say that it had been pressed upon them from different quarters that one of the best means of relieving the distress would be to assist in some way the construction of earthworks for railways. It appeared to some of those with whom he acted that there was a good deal in that suggestion. In some parts of Ireland—in Donegal, for example—there were two or three railways for which Acts had been already obtained; but the promoters could not get money from the Treasury without some security beyond that of the railways themselves. There was the West Donegal Railway, running northwards from Donegal to meet the Derry lines at Stranalar; and there was the competing railway running from Donegal eastwards to catch the Great Northern system at Helleck. Both these railways passed through poor districts, which were incapable of raising money in the ordinary way; and the landlords were not in a position to come forward and give the collateral security which the Government required. In addition to these, another railway was, he believed, to be constructed in the county of Clare. It

He recommended also that larger advances should be made towards building and improving piers in connection with the Irish fisheries. They must look to the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to take care that the people did not starve.

MR. BIGGAR said, that he had put down a Notice of Opposition to the Bill in order to secure a full discussion of the measure, and because it was as worthless a measure as could be expected from a right hon. Gentleman who knew nothing of Ireland. It had been said that the present Chief Secretary had conferred an honour upon Ireland by becoming Chief Secretary. He was disposed to join issue on that matter, because he thought a Gentleman by getting a high position did not pay a compliment to anyone. As to the qualifications of the right hon. Gentleman, they had in the last Government a Chief Secretary for Ireland whom it was the custom of Irish Members to ridicule. The only difference that he saw between those two right hon. Gentlemen was that the former Chief Secretary had Tory views and stuck to them; the present Chief Secretary spoke very kind words sometimes; but, as far as the present Bill went, he did not propose anything better for Ireland than the late Government. The right hon. Gentleman called this measure a Bill for the relief of distress in Ireland. But he (Mr. Biggar) was disposed to amend the title, and call this a Bill for the relief of the distress of landlords in Ireland, because landlords would get a very much larger amount under the provisions of this Bill than other people in Ireland. One grievous proposal was that this money was to come out of the Church Fund. In his opinion, the Irish Church Surplus should be kept for some better purpose than putting money into the pockets of the landlords. It would be difficult, under the provisions of this Bill, to insure a proper distribution of the money to be given to the landlords among the people who were in distress; and in any case none of it would reach the hands of the small tenant farmers on the mountain sides, by whom the distress was the most severely felt. The 3rd and 4th clauses were drawn in a very loose manner, and they gave authority to a very irresponsible body, because it allowed the presentment sessions to borrow money and to pledge the rates, without any guarantee that any relief would reach the distressed poor. Railways and other works were to be undertaken; but what guarantee had the ratepayers that such works once begun would be carried through? Instead of reading the Bill a second time, it should be sent back to the Government for them to produce something more reasonable. The Bill would not relieve the distress at all, and it would be no use. In his opinion, it would be no grievance to the Irish people if this measure was put back; and he advised the Government to withdraw it, with instructions that they should prepare one more calculated to effect the purpose desired.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) thought that in some of the remarks which had been made they were hardly doing sufficient justice to the last Parliament or to themselves. Last Session all were agreed that the distress should be relieved efficiently so far as was practicable, and they wanted to have a Bill for the purpose passed as soon as possible. With regard to the discussion which had taken place, he wished to mention a few points, because it seemed to him that justice had hardly been done to the late Government with respect to the loans made to landlords. He had looked through the debates that had taken place in February and March; and he found that, although the subject was then touched upon, there had been no earnest opposition to advances of money to landlords for the employment of unskilled labour in the improvement of their land. The great anxiety was that immediate steps should be taken to relieve the distress in Ireland by employing the people; and perhaps they might not have been sufficiently careful as to the way in which the relief should reach the people. There was, in fact, no substantial objection raised to the money being lent to landlords; though there was a general desire, and one hon. Member certainly did press on the Government, to take care that the improvements effected by means of the money advanced should not be made by the landlords the ground for unduly increasing the rents of their tenants. The late Government had in November last issued a Notice that money would be advanced to landlords for drainage and other improvement works, that being considered the best way of meeting the distress. The Government, however, were disappointed to find that the terms on which this money was offered did not attract the landlords; and on the 12th of January following another and a more liberal notice was issued, offering money without any interest for the first two years and at 1 per cent afterwards. No one objected to that when the House met in February, and the result was that a large sum was applied for. The second notice had, perhaps, succeeded too well; and now complaint was made that the amount borrowed by the landlords, £1,250,000, was too large. But who was responsible for that? The question was not one of Party; and as everyone in the last Parliament was responsible for the offer, Her Majesty's present Government had felt themselves bound to provide funds with which to carry out the offer made by the late Government, sanctioned by the last Parliament, such offer being also one which the landowners were perfectly entitled to accept, regarding it purely from the point of view of their own interests. It was all very well to say that the landowners, as compared with tenants, should not be allowed to make profit out of the offer of the Government; and, as far as he knew, there was no wish on the part of the Government that any such profit should be made. But he also saw no reason why a scheme which seemed just should not be carried fully into effect, though it had been brought before Parliament and carried by a previous Administration, with, of course, different views on questions of general politics. There had been no concealment about the matter. It had been openly and fully discussed, and when it was under discussion it was described by several of the Irish Members as an admirable measure. The statute then passed confirmed the offer of the 12th January, and all loans made under it; and was it not the duty of the present Government to see that the engagements so made to the landlords were kept, and that the money promised to them should be forthcoming? That was the explanation he had to give for the 1st clause of that Bill.

MR. PARNELL: I am asking what amount of loans was sanctioned up to the time the late Government went out of Office?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): The amount must be practically the same as now, because all the applications had to be made before a certain date—namely, the 29th February. It was to meet the demands of those who thus applied for loans that this large sum was now required. The present Government when they came into power found that about £1,250,000 had been applied for. It would not be just or right for them to attempt, under the pretence of not sanctioning loans, to keep down the amount. But not only had the amount he had stated been applied for, but it had been actually sanctioned before the present Government came into Office; and all that remained for them was to keep faith with those whose applications had thus been made and sanctioned. The matter was practically one of contract entered into by the late Parliament with the landlords; and he thought hon. Gentlemen would feel that contract must be honestly kept. Passing on to what the present Government had introduced into the Bill for the purpose of affording additional relief of distress, he (Mr. Law) might perhaps be permitted to say that it had been pressed upon them from different quarters that one of the best means of relieving the distress would be to assist in some way the construction of earthworks for railways. It appeared to some of those with whom he acted that there was a good deal in that suggestion. In some parts of Ireland—in Donegal, for example—there were two or three railways for which Acts had been already obtained; but the promoters could not get money from the Treasury without some security beyond that of the railways themselves. There was the West Donegal Railway, running northwards from Donegal to meet the Derry lines at Stranalar; and there was the competing railway running from Donegal eastwards to catch the Great Northern system at Helleck. Both these railways passed through poor districts, which were incapable of raising money in the ordinary way; and the landlords were not in a position to come forward and give the collateral security which the Government required. In addition to these, another railway was, he believed, to be constructed in the county of Clare. It seemed probable that, in such cases, a large amount of relief might very advantageously be given by thus supplying to unskilled labour; and his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), after communication with the Treasury, had succeeded in getting the matter so arranged that the collateral guarantee necessary to induce the Treasury to lend money might be in the form of a baronial guarantee. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said that a baronial guarantee might be oppressive, and did not appear to regard presentment sessions favourably. But presentment sessions were, after all, the only existing bodies which could be said in any sense to represent the localities; and they must first work with such machinery as existed, however imperfect, though he hoped they would not very much longer suffer under the misfortune of not having representative bodies for county administration. It had been said that the presentment sessions might be imposed upon. Well, no doubt that was possible; but certainly, so far as he knew, in the North of Ireland at any rate, they were not at all likely to be imposed upon; and he felt tolerably confident that the farmers, who formed a large proportion of the baronial sessions, were not likely to undertake any guarantee which was not likely to benefit themselves. There was, again, no danger whatever of the sessions giving guarantee for the purpose of bolstering up, as had been said, insolvent Companies. These provisions of the Bill would facilitate the opening up of parts of the country which now much needed proper means of transit; they would give great relief, and might, perhaps, do much to prevent a recurrence of distress and famine in future days. The baronial guarantee would only amount to one-fourth of the whole cost of the works to be carried out; and, therefore, he did not see that any great burden could fall upon the baronies. With respect to the fishery piers, the hon. Member for the City of Cork did not, he understood, object to that portion of the Bill; and he would find, on referring to the Piers and Harbours Act of 1846, that no additional burden would be imposed upon any locality. He thought the House would see that the Government had only endeavoured to keep faith with the landowners with whom engagements had been made by the late Government and Parliament; and he hoped they would be aided by hon. Members in their effort to have the Bill passed as soon as possible. He could assure them that the Government were most anxious to make the Bill as good a measure as possible for the purposes for which it was designed.

MR. DALY said, if he had understood the facts of the matter right, he gathered from the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) that the late Government allowed the landlords to borrow £750,000 for the construction of certain works, and the present Bill seemed to be introduced to meet the liabilities incurred by the late Government. To that he did not object. He considered that, although the present measure was a necessary one to carry out the promises made under the Act of 1880, yet neither of the two measures effected the immediate relief of distress, which was the professed object of the Government, inasmuch as the money granted would not reach the pockets of the persons employed within a period of three months. The first and most important question was the necessity of the immediate relief for the distress in Ireland; and he did not think that the means proposed by the Bill were adequate for that purpose. He failed to gather from the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken that any provision had been made for the completion of the works which had been referred to. That was a most indefensible omission, made alike by the late and by the present Government. In connection with the amount of money applied for, too, he did not understand from the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there was any provision for preventing the landowners whose estates were improved raising their rents without assigning any good cause for doing so. He objected to the application of the Church Fund for the purposes of that Act. There would be a loss of 2½ per cent per annum on what was borrowed, and that in Ireland ought to be looked upon as a national calamity. That fund was intended for purely Irish purposes; and he thought the distress in Ireland was a subject of national interest, and ought to have been met out of national resources. He its minerals, and the production of its soil would, with the industry of its inhabitants, be sufficient to keep the country in independence and in affluence if a wall of brass 80 cubits high were drawn around the Island. But they asked as suppliants, in the meantime, for what they believed belonged to them. Instead of assuming the grandiloquence of ignorance, and stepping into the terra incognita of statesmanship, he would simply say that the Bill declared two things—namely, that there was distress in Ireland, and that the Government were willing to do something to relieve it. Would to God the second declaration were as true as the first! Instead of bolstering up this foundling—for it was no Bill of the present Government, but one which had been discovered among the spolia optima of the late Administration—without confusing themselves with it, the Government ought at once to set aside a sum—take it from where they would—for the relief of the existing distress. Thirteen months ago he ventured to say that that distress would be deplorable, and deplorable it had been. In other lands God at times pleased that there should be scarcity of food; but in Ireland poverty and scarcity of food were the normal conditions. He did not think himself justified in arguing as to the eternal purposes of the Ruler of the Universe. It was better to deal solely with what was within our horizon, and to admit at once that much might be done by man himself. Many parts of Ireland were not permitted to produce its fulness, and the people were not permitted to extract from the soil the fruits of the industry they were ready to bestow upon it; and he hoped that when the House was called upon to consider the present unsatisfactory relations existing between the landlords and tenants of Ireland, they would approach the question with a sincere desire to do justice, and he besought the House to decide that night without further delay to relieve the grievous distress of the people of that wretched country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER trusted that they might be allowed to come to a decision that evening. He thought the time had come when he, as having charge of the Bill, should say what he had to say on the subjects touched upon in the debate. He did not know whether the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Nelson) and himself were likely to agree upon the action of the Government, though he did not know why they should differ. He was very glad that the suffering men of Mayo had got so eloquent a Representative to tell to the House their feelings, their wants, their sufferings, and even what they might consider their wrongs, as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He felt that the hon. Member had a right to ask the Government what they had done, during their short period of Office, for the mitigation of Irish distress, and how they had attempted to meet it. This was the middle of June; and when the present Government took Office in the beginning of May, they found, as they had expected, a severe battle raging between distress and relief. That distress, immediate and intense, had been caused mainly by the failure of the crops in Ireland, and, to some extent, by their failure in England also, as causing a less demand for Irish agricultural labour; while, in a much less degree, it had been increased by the competition for labour between the manufacturing and the agricultural districts. Now, he did not wish it to be supposed that, although that distress might be described as the act of God, he would not say that man could do nothing to alleviate it. He thought it was a disgrace to them, and a disgrace to all the Members of both Houses of Parliament—and he did not acquit Irish Members of their share—that they had allowed the state of Ireland to be such that, to apply an eloquent expression used in a former debate, there were only two or three crops between the small cottier tenant in Ireland and destitution and misery. Up to the beginning of May the distress had been met mainly by charitable contributions from all parts of the world, for which he heartily thanked their fellow-subjects in Australia and Canada and their kinsmen in America. He thought it was the right hon. the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Gray), in a speech full of good suggestions, who stated what he (Mr. Forster) could hardly agree with, that charitable organizations had done what the Government ought to have done. It was said that a far better mode of relief would be by means of relief works; and who could doubt that the most careful exercise of charity, either by Poor Law officials or benevolent committees, must always lords of Ireland for the improvement of their estates, believing that in improving their estates they would give labour to the poor. Now, he objected to the Church Surplus Fund being applied in that way. If the Government wanted to lend more money to the landlords, he had not the smallest objection to their doing so out of the Treasury funds. With regard to the second mode of advance—namely, that to the presentment sessions, which was to be made out of the Treasury funds, he objected to it on the ground that it would throw a great weight on the ratepayers for 15 years. What, therefore, he should propose was that, instead of the Government taking the loans to be given to the landlords out of the Church Surplus Fund, they should take it out of the Treasury, and that they should advance money out of the Church Surplus to the presentment sessions, reconstituting those sessions and giving them a more representative character, and then the money might be applied in a very useful way to the various localities. But in any case he hoped the Government would not trust to the Board of Works or to the Local Government Board. He made that observation, because he regretted to say that the Chief Secretary seemed to be likely to fall into the error which had cramped the energies of his Predecessors in Office, of inclining too much to the advice of old officials in Dublin. The way in which the Local Government Board in Ireland managed its business was a crying evil and a gigantic shame. He complained that in certain districts works had been rejected, on the Report of the Poor Law Inspectors, which had been sanctioned by the presentment sessions, and also complained of a system of government which could allow of such proceedings. If the Irish people were not allowed to manage their own local affairs their Representatives in Parliament ought at least to have some voice in matters of this kind. If the government of Ireland were to be still carried on by the system of reticence and secrecy which had so long prevailed, he should do all he could to make the English people acquainted with the reality of the evils under which Ireland laboured. There was also a third mode of advance, which consisted of the free gift of £30,000 by the Treasury for the construction of fishery harbours and piers.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

He had no objection to this; but he pointed out that this grant was merely an anticipation of the contribution for the purpose which was authorized by Parliament for those useful works on the coast. He highly approved of the course taken by the Government in appointing a small Committee to adjudicate upon the claims which had been sent in by various localities for harbours; and he wished that the Government would extend the system to other branches of relief instead of leaving the work to Boards of Guardians and other kindred bodies.

MR. NELSON said, his appearance in that honourable Parliament, the decisions of which influenced more or less the opinions of the whole civilized world, was, he humbly submitted, a speech in itself. He believed he represented public opinion in Ireland, and he had been sent there by one of the counties of that Island to express their opinion, and he trusted he would have grace from God to express the mind of Ireland in the minority. What he would say to an open-air meeting he would say in that House. It was a remarkable thing that a man like himself, whose previous groove of action was so removed from active politics, should have been called upon without opposition to come to that House to express the opinion, at any rate, of one suffering county of Ireland. However important to that Kingdom—called by a figure of speech “United”—might be the decision by which they might be led, there was not much evidence, from the empty appearance of many of the benches, that the Parliament of Britain was interested in the condition of Ireland. The Representatives of Ireland appeared constantly in the House as suppliants, and fond Parliament must be of suppliants, when she compelled them thus to appear for centuries, and year after year. Ireland would not always thus present herself. He was not sure that in the history of nations any people had by the attitude of supplication either maintained its liberty or recovered its independence. The British Parliament compelled the Representatives of Ireland to appear as suppliants. He would, however, warn right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench that they were walking Suppositos cineri doloso.”

The people of Ireland believed that, by the blessing of Heaven, the resources of the Reports that he got were more hopeful. One day he might find a Union getting worse—he got one or two bad Reports to-day and yesterday—but, generally speaking, he found them more hopeful. The works, about which so much had been said, were giving much more employment, and many hundreds and thousands of persons were coming over to England, where there was hope of getting work. He believed there was some truth in what was said by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that many of those who came in the spring were disappointed; but a good many now were successful. The chief business they had to do was to tide over the next two or three months. His hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Nelson) had been rather struck by the difference between the two sides of the House. His hon. Friend's experience of the House was short; but when he had been there a few years he would find that they were not so utterly neglectful of the public good as he supposed, and that there was more agreement in passing practical measures between the two opposite sides of the House and the two Front Benches than sometimes appeared. The late Government had left their successors two or three useful measures. The first was the alteration in the Poor Law, which enabled out-door relief to be given. He (Mr. Forster) was very much obliged to them for it; and his only doubt, looking to the past, was whether it should not have been done earlier. The result had been that occupiers of above a quarter of an acre could now receive Poor Law relief without losing their holdings. There were 37 Unions in which the necessary Orders were now in force, and, according to a Return at the end of last month—he had a later, but had mislaid it—there were 117,000 persons receiving relief in or out of the work-houses. That looked a large number; but it did not come up to the English standard. In England, at this moment, there was just under 3 per cent of the population receiving relief; in Ireland the number was about 2·1, so that, in spite of everything, the weight upon the rates was not so great in Ireland as in England. The next measure carried by the late Government was the Seed Act, which had really done immense good. He wished to take that opportunity of thanking the late Government for it, and also his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan), who had much to do with it. He would not say that there had not been some recklessness in the use of that Act; but without it they should have been in the most imminent danger next year. The large sum of £600,000 had been lent under it. He came now to those debateable matters under the Relief Act. He would take the baronial presentment sessions first, because it was only for the loans under these that he was personally responsible. His Predecessor did not sanction any baronial presentment loans, which came up only just before he left Office, and he naturally left them to his successor. The first thing he had to do was to look over the applications, and in almost every case he found work going on under the landlords and sanitary authorities. The hon. Member for Galway complained of the mode in which these baronial sessions were dealt with. What they did was this—they sent down two sets of Inspectors, Inspectors of the Board of Works, and Inspectors of the Local Government Board, to see that the works were useful and that employment was given. Both those conditions were necessary. Unless work was useful it was little better than gratuitous relief, and the very object of lending the money at 1 per cent was to give employment. Although they thought they ought undoubtedly to sanction all the loans on which the two Inspectors were agreed, it did not follow that they should not sanction any where the Inspectors disagreed. Up to June 5, £185,000 were applied for under the baronial sessions, and of that £113,000 had been sanctioned. By a Return which he hoped would be in possession of the House within a day or two, the amount issued before the 31st of May was £32,000, and he believed a great deal more was issued by this time. Hon. Members would find that these works were giving considerable employment even now. The hon. Member for Galway had said that 1 per cent was a delusion. He (Mr. Forster) knew his hon. Friend was never likely to be in a position to require to borrow money; but if he had to borrow money, he would not think it a delusion at all if he were to get it at 1 per cent; and if he was kindly told be accompanied by some amount of demoralization and some imposition? The very nature of such a form of relief must bring some evil with it. But he knew from some little study of benevolent action, although some hon. Gentlemen might not agree with him, that when those tremendous calamities came upon them they could scarcely meet them by public labour works alone. There must be charitable relief accompanying them, and for this reason—that the people upon whom the distress most severely fell were those who had not any able-bodied man in their family, and who, therefore, could not work, so that public works afforded them no help. After the date he had mentioned—the beginning of May—when he entered upon Office, the charitable funds were not altogether expended—he trusted they were not yet altogether expended—but they were diminishing, and they must continue to diminish. He thus found coming upon him a very formidable responsibility; and without inquiring to what extent the distress was due to the sins of omission or commission of the people themselves, a Government was bound to keep its people from the absolute and final results of destitution. The Lord Mayor of Dublin doubted whether he (Mr. Forster) was aware of the responsibility he had undertaken. He was painfully aware of it. He warned his Predecessor before the Dissolution of Parliament that this would happen. When the very honourable post of Chief Secretary for Ireland was offered to him—and he might say that it was the Office which of all others he would rather have had in any Ministry—he knew well enough that the first thing he would have to deal with would be the state of distress during the two or three months between the diminution of these funds and the harvest. Accordingly he set to work at once to do what he thought the only thing to be done. He only stated what he had endeavoured to do, and what he had been supported by the officials in doing. They had kept the closest possible watch over the distressed districts, especially those worst off; and as the charitable relief must cease, or apparently be largely diminished, they thought that the official relief should step in. Orders were sent to the Inspectors to keep constantly looking through those Unions, and to insist upon out-door relief where it was necessary; for they knew very well that in some places where it was most wanted—the hon. Member for Mayo could point to two or three—the ratepayers themselves were greatly distressed, because few men of property were living among them; and, therefore, the order to give relief was accompanied with the lending of money to enable the relief to be given. That was the line they were taking, and he really thought they were succeeding. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said he (Mr. Forster) must not be content with sitting in the Office reading the Reports. Well, what more would the hon. Member do if he were in his place than read the Reports, bring all the knowledge he could to bear upon them, get all the information he could from other sources, checking them, and wherever he thought there was danger calling the attention of the Local Government Board to the danger? In fact, he really could not charge his conscience with not having done as much as he could. The hon. Member for Galway spoke about young Inspectors. A young man was not necessarily bad for such a business because he was a man of 24. This young Inspector was the son of Mr. Robinson, Vice President of the Local Government Board—though that did not necessarily qualify him for the post—and an old friend who had helped him in the Famine years, Mr. Tuke, who had gone lately through Donegal and Mayo, who travelled with him for some days, gave a very good account of the young man, and said it would be difficult to find a better Inspector.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY explained, that what he had said was that the Inspector in question had disallowed more works than any other Inspector in Ireland; that at least two-thirds of the refusals of the Local Government Board in the counties of Galway and Mayo were due to him.

MR. W. E. FORSTER doubted very much whether his hon. Friend had all the details before him, or if the statistics would bear out that statement. Certainly, the hon. Member did seem to give an impression that the Local Government Board Inspectors were not to be trusted. All he could say, if confidence could not be placed in them, then confidence must very much disappear altogether. Well, the Reports that he got were more hopeful. One day he might find a Union getting worse—he got one or two bad Reports to-day and yesterday—but, generally speaking, he found them more hopeful. The works, about which so much had been said, were giving much more employment, and many hundreds and thousands of persons were coming over to England, where there was hope of getting work. Hon. Members would find that these works were giving considerable employment even now. The hon. Member for Galway had said that 1 per cent was a delusion. He (Mr. Forster) knew his hon. Friend was never likely to be in a position to require to borrow money; but if he had to borrow money, he would not think it a delusion at all if he were to get it at 1 per cent; and if he was kindly told that he might pay back the principal, not in large instalments, but in small sums from year to year, he would think it still better. They issued orders that they should have weekly Returns of the number of persons at work. He would not dwell on the loans to the sanitary authorities. It would appear that but a small proportion of them had been sanctioned. He now came to the loans to the landlords; for these the present Government were certainly pledged, but not responsible. The applications were made before the present Government came into Office. The terms on which these loans were asked were embodied in the letter which practically formed part of the Bill passed at the beginning of this year. They were in reality these—that if the landlords would find security they would get the loans. When he came into Office they were limited to £1,200,000. The 17th section of the Act only provided £750,000 for the payment of the obligations; but what did the late Government do? They entered into larger obligations than the £750,000 would meet; and, therefore, the present Government found themselves in this position—they must either ask the House for more money, or break faith with those who applied for loans. That was the real fact of the matter. The House must not suppose that this £1,500,000 was all given to the landlords. The Government were taking the very utmost sum that would be wanted. He did not think it would be all wanted. It was easy to be wise after the event. If the late Government were now in their place, they would, no doubt, be sorry that they had not made more conditions. But there was one condition, that if before the 31st of July a second instalment of the loan had not been issued the remainder would be lent at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The landlords, therefore, knew what their position was, and the condition to which he referred would, no doubt, increase the employment between this and the 31st of July, because they would be anxious to come in for the loan at 1 per cent. He thought it was a pity they had not tied the landlords down more to time; but the present Government, he repeated, were not responsible for the condition. They took the condition and had to fulfil it. But, after all, it was doing a great deal more good than the House supposed. Up to the 31st of May the amount issued to the landlords was £240,000. The sum had been very much increased since. The last week of which he had an account £20,000 was issued; and that sum, he thought, would represent the employment of 35,000 to 40,000 men. He did not wish to exaggerate the importance of this Bill. It was not on the works, public or private, he relied for getting over the difficulties between this and harvest. It was upon out-door relief he relied; though he also looked for considerable help in employment. He trusted the House would pass this Bill, especially the clause relating to the £750,000—not because it was a good bargain, or because it was the best that could be made, but because it was a bargain, and must be fulfilled. If by chance the House should refuse to fulfil its bargain, the result might be confusion, the stopping of works, a great increase of distress, and an addition to the numbers that would have to be relieved. It must be remembered that it was not merely one Government taking up the acts of another, but it was one Parliament taking up the acts of a previous Parliament, and in the last Parliament there was no division against loans to the landlords, or against the interest to be charged for them. He did not agree that there was no security to the tenants, as he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) would have a very considerable effect in preventing landlords charging for the improvements a higher rate of interest than they paid. In the existing condition of things, he looked round to see if anything else could be done. It was too late to change the lines of action already taken. It was too late to adopt loans to tenants instead of loans to landlords. He saw there were two things which might do good. There were the fishery piers. Of course, an Irish Secretary was anxious to do what he could for Ireland; but it was the duty of the Treasury to guard the public purse. He succeeded in obtaining this grant of £30,000, and hon. Members who thought it ought to be £60,000 might leave that for the Committee. What was wanted was the Bill to make it possible to do something at once. There was the possibility of another bad autumn and winter, and it was necessary to develop industry on the West Coast, so as to give some alternative employment to the cultivation of the wretched holdings. To do this it was necessary to take advantage of the Canadian grant. As to the faulty constitution of the baronial sessions, no doubt there were a good many things in Ireland that needed to be changed or reformed; but for small practical measures they must make use of the existing machinery, until the machinery could be improved. He believed county government in Ireland was very bad; but they had to deal with desolate and wild districts which were, however, capable of immediate development and improvement, and must use the agency ready to their hand. He thought he had made out a case for, at any rate, getting the Bill into Committee, where the Government would gladly hear any suggestion which might be offered. If they could meet the wishes of hon. Members, they would gladly do so; but he must confess that he did not think they could now enter on a new line of action. An hon. Member had spoken of the possibility of another bad harvest and winter; he could only say if that was to be so he should wish himself anywhere but in the position he held. All he could say at present was that it was impossible for any hon. Member from Ireland, even if he had just come from the suffering people of Mayo, to be more convinced than he was that if there came another bad winter and a bad harvest the Government would have to take some very strong and summary measures to prevent absolute destitution, if not starvation, and he believed his Colleagues shared that opinion with him.

MR. BLAKE said, that he agreed with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the sum of £30,000 proposed by the Government for the improvement of harbours in Ireland would be wholly inadequate, there being some 40 or 50 that required it, and that that sum, even when supplemented by the Canadian grant, would not meet the wants of more than a dozen of them. The Bill only allowed £30,000 for harbour piers; and the most that could be expended on any harbour was £3,000. He contended that more money should have been devoted by the Government to improving harbours, because nothing could pay better than the expenditure upon them. He would suggest that the 6th clause of the Bill should be struck out; otherwise, as regarded the fisheries in Ireland, the Bill would not be worth the paper on which it was printed. He could confirm what had been said as to the Irish officials; for his belief, after a long experience, was that the right hon. Gentleman would find them trustworthy, intelligent, and most anxious to promote the interests of the country.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that when a similar Bill was introduced by the late Government he confined himself to the plain statement of the fact that it seemed to him queer that when £750,000 was voted to the Irish landlords at a time when they were not receiving their rents, that the ratepayers should be asked to tax themselves for the relief of the people. Although his statement was ridiculed at the time, many people had since said that there "was very much in what Pat O'Brien said." But the proposition of the present Government was precisely the same as that made by the late Government; and every objection which he had urged against the proposal of the late Government applied with equal force to the present Bill. He considered that the proposition of the Government was incomplete, and did not meet the necessities of the case. The proposition was one which no Irishman with the feelings of an Irishman would support in the House if he thought he could get anything better. [Laughter.] He could understand the laugh; but he thought hon. Gentlemen ought not to sneer at the distress under which Ireland was suffering. What was the proposition of the Government? It was to give £750,000 to the landlords of Ireland, and that was not the way to meet the distress. He was ready to join in the opposition to the Bill; and, notwithstanding what might be written in the Irish papers next Saturday, he should continue to do his duty in the position he held as the Representative of the humblest man in Ireland as well as the richest. He was a humble Irish landlord, and the question was whether there was great distress in Ireland, and would the Bill meet that distress? He should support the measure of the right hon. Gentleman, for it seemed to him to afford relief to Irish landlords by giving them loans, although it would do little to meet the present distress.

MR. WARTON, who rose amid considerable interruption, said, that in that debate 14 hon. Members had spoken, 13 of whom were Irish, and the other was the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. It was rather hard, therefore, that Irish Members should call out "Agreed" and "Divide," when not a single English Member had yet had an opportunity of speaking on that question. They heard often of "justice to Ireland." Surely they should occasionally, once in a way, have a little justice to England, and allow English Members to say a few words, especially as they had been taunted with their indifference to that subject. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had suggested that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have called a conference of the Irish Members on that measure; but, looking at the diversity of opinion which appeared to prevail among those hon. Members, some of whom regarded the Bill as absolutely worthless, he doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman would have gained great advantage by adopting that suggestion. He was anxious to know how far they were to be treated to those mutual interchanges of compliments between the third Party and the Chief Secretary, of which they had already witnessed so many. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) must, he (Mr. Warton) thought, be almost tired—nay, sick—of those compliments, because they had been paid to him for a purpose—namely, so to work upon his generous nature as to squeeze from him even more than he might be disposed to give. That was nothing more nor less—except as to the amount—than the Bill of the late Government, which was strongly supported by those Irish Members who were now crying out against it, because they knew that they would get justice for Ireland from the Conservative Government, but they hoped to get something more than justice from the present Government. They had seen an hon. Member from Ireland rise and make a suggestion. Perhaps, he said, it would be a good thing if they took away from the Irish tenants the opportunity of paying their rent. Then the House would be told that that was a matter worthy of consideration. If, again, a suggestion was made that money should be lent to the tenants, instead of the landlord, they would be told that that also was worthy of consideration. The Government took 11 days to make up their minds whether they would consent to the principle of the monstrous Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). He had marked the action of the Government, not in order to say what was unfriendly, but to see whether they would be firm in resisting those monstrous claims, and not support, tacitly or openly, an Irish agitation to get the property of the landlords, and, if so, he would support them. There was no excuse for the Government. They were not driven by necessity. They had a large majority, and the Irish Members were not able to turn the scale against them. He did not object to the kind expressions of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or to his velvet glove; but he wanted to know whether an iron hand was under that glove when Irish Members threatened them with outrage and revolution in Ireland. The Government had given way on important matters. He hoped they were not going to make concessions which ought never to be granted. He wanted to know whether the sacred rights of property were to be maintained or not. If they were, the Government would have the support of the Opposition against agitators in Ireland. The most practical question for Ireland at the present moment was, were rents to be paid or not? The disposition of a great many Irish people was against paying rents, and those who were able were advised not to pay. He knew an instance of this disposition, and warned the Government against the danger of losing the confidence and sympathy of those who respected the rights of property, which danger they might incur if they went in for a policy of confiscation for the sake of getting a few votes from Irish Members.

MR. BYRNE said, if the Bill were really what it proposed to be, no Irish Member would incur the responsibility of voting against it; but a virtue was claimed for it which it did not really possess. It was a bad Bill—it was bastard legislation. The Bill gave scarcely any relief to Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had not proved his case. On the contrary, he had proved his case very much against himself, for in effect the right hon. Gentleman said—“We have taken up the Business of the late Government, and we feel bound to carry it on as we find it.” It was a bad Bill, because it proposed to take money out of the Irish Church Fund instead of the Imperial Exchequer. If the money only went to the relief of Irish distress, he (Mr. Byrne) would not object to the amount being even £2,000,000; but the truth was that a considerable proportion of the grant would go to pay the debt contracted by the late Government. The Government were the trustees of the Irish Church Surplus Fund; and money for the relief of distress in Ireland should not come out of that fund, but out of the Imperial Exchequer. The Irish people would expect a rigid account of the Irish Church Surplus Fund, to which they claimed to be entitled.

Mr. GILL said, that for some time past he had been aware that the Mansion House Relief Committee were not in a position as regarded the funds to attend properly to their duties. Quite recently he had been in communication with gentlemen who were some of the best informed of its Members; and they had informed him that, no doubt, the distress was increasing rather than diminishing at the present, and that numerous small farmers were requiring relief, their means being exhausted—which had never been more than scanty—who had not required relief earlier. Taking that into account, he would earnestly impress upon Her Majesty's Government to do something for the country. The relief works did not, in fact, contribute to the alleviation of the distress; and, therefore, he thought that, considering the amount of distress which would probably exist before harvest, they ought to grant a sum of money to the Relief Committees which were at present in existence. In the districts in which the distress was, there were numerous sub-committees, and reports as to the real state of the distress reached the authorities. The real way to alleviate the distress, he was convinced, was to grant them money. He thought it could easily be done without great loss to the Treasury or any other Department. In fact, it would not entail so much loss as would the Bill which was now before them. At a moderate computation, by lending the money at 1 instead of 3 per cent, there would be a loss to the Church Fund of £350,000. He would suggest that £200,000 or £250,000 might be given at once, instead of lending it to landlords. Two per cent might be charged for the money lent to the landlords instead of one per cent, and that would almost produce the amount which the expenditure he had suggested would require. He did not see why money lent to landlords on that occasion should be advanced at the small rate of one per cent. He trusted that the great amount of distress which did at present exist would soon disappear, but hoped the Government would take into consideration the course he had suggested. He must add that there could be no doubt that there was a considerable substratum of politics which entered into that question, and that was one reason why the Government had not been more active in the matter. He hoped that inaction would not be attended with the terrible responsibility which would attach if there were deaths from famine in Ireland. He hoped that the present Government, by the course it was now taking, would not bring that terrible responsibility upon them. Such a responsibility had attached to the Government of 1847 on account of the inaction of the then Government and Prime Minister, and he trusted that nothing like that would occur now. He impressed upon them the necessity of doing something immediately; if not, there would certainly be numerous deaths before harvest, and, moreover, the people would not have sufficient strength to reap their corn and dig their potatoes on account of the state of weakness and sickness to which they would be reduced, which was the inevitable consequence of the destitution from which they were at present suffering. The reason he underrated the relief works was because he believed they would do little good to the districts. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said a short time ago that there could be no doubt the relief works would not relieve everyone, but only the able-bodied men who could take advantage of them. He was afraid that before long they would be painfully aware of the truthfulness of that statement. In 1847 a gentleman had narrated to him some circumstances of the famine of that time. That gentleman was engaged as an engineer on the relief works, whose could be relied on; and he had assured him that he found of a morning, as he went to the works, groups of wretched beings huddled together by the hedges and in the ditches, with the famine fever glaring in their eyes; and he had made a calculation as to how many he should be likely to find alive when he returned from his work. He assured the Government that if active relief measures were not taken something like that would certainly be likely to happen; and he was sure that that was a state of circumstances which Her Majesty's Government did not wish to see brought about.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether he proposed to take the Committee on the Bill to-morrow (Friday)? There was not, he thought, sufficient opportunity afforded for preparing Amendments to the Bill; and although the Irish Members had done all they could to arrange about Amendments, there had not been sufficient time to bring them forward, and they had, therefore, made small progress in that direction. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman really wished to get into Committee, they could then move to report Progress, with the understanding that some days, or perhaps a week, later the matter could come up for further consideration. He trusted that the postponement would take place—say, until next week, in order that they might have the opportunity of drawing up Amendments that would be satisfactory.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he was sorry the hon. Member had stated that the Amendments were not ready. The Bill had been before the House some time, and both the Bill and the clauses were very short; and he thought that ample time had been allowed for the consideration of Amendments. Considering the feeling on the part of Irish Members, perhaps he ought not to go further than the present stage of the Bill. It was not for him to press the Bill forward unduly; but he must state that, considering the anxiety which he had that the Bill should be passed as quickly as possible, he trusted that they would allow them to get into Committee on it, and to make some real progress with it to-morrow.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MELLOR, Bill to amend the Common Law Procedure Acts and the Judicature Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MELLOR, Mr. GREGORY, and Mr. MARRIOTT. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 229.]

MUNICIPALITY OF LONDON BILL.

On Motion of Mr. FIRTH, Bill for creating a Municipality and County of London; and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. FIRTH, Mr. THOROLD ROGERS, Mr. POTTER, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. BRAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 228.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD NORTON, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that the Fourth Schedule be omitted from the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, and now lying on the Table of this House,” said, the 4th Schedule was a table of specific subjects of instruction, including mathematics, mechanics, animal physiology, physical geography, botany, Latin, French, and German. In the words of the Code—

“For the continuous teaching throughout the year of one or two of those subjects public payment will be made.”

As the Code made this offer without any limitation of age, and they knew the assumption and practice was to carry it on to 18, this was secondary education of the middle classes charged on rates and taxes of the whole community. But that was not within the scope of the elementary education for which Parliament had allowed public aid. It stood in the way of good middle-class education, answered to the School Commissioners' description as "essentially and necessarily superficial, pretentious, and unreal," and seriously injured the elementary education of the working classes. The Endowed Schools Commission in 1868 did not hesitate even to attribute the supposed deficiency of our artizans, as compared with those of other countries, to the want of a good basis of sound general education before special instruction began. This wretched assumption by Government of middle-class education under the name of elementary, which, after all, was a mere cramming the memory with the vocabulary of sciences and alphabets of unmastered foreign languages for evanescent show and deceitful prizes on examination, entailed, by the Report of almost every Inspector, a very general neglect of ordinary reading, writing, and arithmetic. The reading in the highest standards was reported as unintelligent, though they were told the other day of the bilinguist children of Wales improving, they knew not from what zero, probably through the very difficulties they had to contend with. Some, of course, must pass in an examination; all could not be plucked, but the standard was extremely low. A good elementary lesson in reading might carry with it in its process more real communication of knowledge than pretence studies of science and languages under the 4th Schedule—an elementary knowledge of nature, for instance, and history and geography, which were all included among class subjects, if only the elementary reading-books were themselves less infected with the vicious aim at heterogeneous cramming. There was a clear line between general elementary and special scientific reading, which they would do well to observe. The Code omitted a limitation at the age of 14 of elementary education as its extreme period beyond which no public aid should be given. This limitation was proposed, not that children who could pass the elementary standard earlier should remain at school to 14 and waste the interval in incipient science. The fewness of those who could do so was a strange argument for a costly training of teachers for them. Most would go out to work and gain the earliest handiness in industry and their share in keeping their home from poverty as soon as they could; and it were mischief to tax the whole community for machinery to force this class away from their apprenticeship and deprive their parents of their earnings to qualify them for other employment, which, after all, might offer no room for them. Those also who showed special aptitude for promotion to higher employment, and those who naturally continued longer at school, would not remain at elements to 14; but these, as soon as the elementary standard was passed, should enter on a higher grade. The best authorities pronounced it a mistake to suppose either such promotion or continuance to higher education required introduction to the higher subjects, or, rather, higher kind of study of subjects in the earlier stage. That should commence in the higher grade. Neither Government nor public money should be charged with this secondary education, except so far as by giving Exhibitions or Scholarships to help clever boys of the working classes unable otherwise to rise to it. Official control of the education of the middle classes would be repugnant to the spirit of this country; and he held that a tax on the working classes, in order to cheapen the education of their employers, was simply an inversion of the principles of our national education. There were middle schools springing up everywhere, to which the elementary schools were feeders, supplying the middle class at about £16 a-year for boarders, or 2s. a-week for day scholars, less than that class were formerly paying for worse education. There were also endowments in every county to aid and lighten this small charge on the middle classes. Under schemes of the Charity Commissioners, old foundations for education, now that elementary education was otherwise provided, were being so adapted. Technical instruction was being provided by the great corporations. At Rugby the whole ground of education was fully covered by elementary, middle, and classical schools, with free passage from one to the other. The President of the Council said he left the Code this year untouched to avoid controversy; but as the late Government were committed to the improvement which he asked, he had only to adopt the same view to avoid controversy, which the retention of the 4th Schedule raised. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that the Fourth Schedule be omitted from the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education and now lying on the Table of this House.—(The Lord Norton.)

THE BISHOP OF EXETER supported the Motion. He shared in the opinion of the noble Lord as to the direction in which the Education Department was drifting. Indeed, he thought the noble Lord had not expressed that opinion as strongly as the occasion demanded; because, if Parliament did not interfere now, interference would be impossible in a short time more. The state of the case appeared to him to be this: At present there was no organized system of secondary education. No doubt there was a great deal of secondary education given, some very good and some very bad; but there was no system which held it together, or put it into relations with the education above or below it. As regarded the labouring classes, they had provided for them an education guaranteed by inspection, and they had no reason to complain. The same thing could not be said of the classes just above them. For middle-class education, there were, first, the endowed schools, and, next, private schools. The former were not connected with the elementary schools or with each other, and there was no guarantee for the quality of the education given in the latter. There was, consequently, a large and practically unoccupied field into which, if Parliament did not interfere, the work of the Education Department would inevitably drift; and before becoming aware of it that Department would be practically taking on itself a very large proportion of the secondary education of the country. As Governor of an endowed school, he had personal experience of the fact that the Education Department were enabling, by drafts on the public purse, a national school to compete with that higher class school, which was under the supervision of another public Department. If Parliament did not interfere the £30,000 granted last year for these national schools might grow to £500,000, and then the vested interests which would have been created would effectually prevent any interference at all. The Code provided that children might be taught at the schools until they were 18; and if they were to keep children at school until they were 18 they might as well give up calling it elementary education. The manner in which the children in the national schools were allowed to present themselves for examination was something like what would be the going up of undergraduates at the Universities for their "great go" before they had been examined for "the little go." Those children might present themselves in mathematics, Latin, and animal physiology before they had been passed in elementary reading. He was not averse from the admission of history, geography, and grammar in the Revised Code; because in acquiring reading, which was the most important branch of elementary education, children must read something, and in the first two of those subjects they would use ordinary reading books, while grammar brought them to understand what they were reading. Therefore, he thought that in the introduction of those subjects there was no departure from the original intentions of the Legislature; but he was of opinion that the introduction of the subjects in the 4th Schedule was a serious injury to the imparting of elementary instruction. Such systematic smattering did not cultivate the intelligence of the child, but merely cultivated its memory in filling it with a knowledge which well deserved to be called "oram," because in a very little time afterwards it was entirely forgotten. Another evil arising from the introduction of those subjects was the demand for masters who could teach them in the elementary schools to the exclusion of masters who could not, but who might be very much better fitted to give elementary instruction, because elementary teachers were not improved by a superficial knowledge of such subjects. He was for having a provision by which children who exhibited superior ability in the elementary schools might have an opening through which they might rise to superior branches of education; but to secure that, there was not the least occasion to enable such children to commence in the elementary schools those more advanced subjects which they ought to learn in the secondary schools. Such children were sure to be discovered, because they would be found to be at the head of their classes in the primary schools, and the masters of the secondary schools would rather receive such children before they had learnt any mathematics, Latin, or animal physiology. In conclusion, he had to express his opinion that it was the duty of the State to organize, as soon as possible, the secondary education of the country.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he came down to the House for the purpose of listening, and with not the least intention of speaking, to see what objection any human being could have to the introduction into elementary schools, permissively (not compulsorily), of the list of subjects in the Minute. He had listened to the speeches of the noble Lord and his right rev. Friend with the most profound astonishment. In Scotland they had had some experience of the frightful dangers which had been held out to frighten them by the noble Lord who made the Motion and by the right rev. Prelate. Scotchmen had some right to speak on this subject. In England elementary education, as conducted by the State, was a thing which was to be dated by some 10, 20, or 30 years back. In Scotland they had it for 300 years in active operation; and they knew what had been the effect of introducing, not merely slightly and permissively, but almost compulsorily, many of these higher subjects into the primary education of the country. That effect had been most admirable. By the consent of all the world, the primary education system of Scotland had been, until the population outran it, one of the most successful in the world. He would explain what that system was. At the time of the Reformation, the Reformers demanded three things of Parliament. They demanded that in every parish there should be an elementary school. They demanded that in every principal town there should be a secondary school; and they demanded that in all great cities of the Kingdom there should be Universities for the education of the people. The system of primary education was adopted by Parliament; but, unfortunately, the secondary education remained much in the same position as in England. No system of secondary education was adopted. But in the elementary schools of the country it had been the custom from the Reformation to include the systematic teaching of those children whose parents applied for it, in Greek, Latin, geography, mathematics, and in other higher branches of education; and in the parish schools of Scotland they had almost all classes, omitting the highest of all. They had the children of paupers sitting on the same benches with the children of the parish minister, and of the medical practitioner. Those who wished to go no further were contented with the ordinary instruction; but those who wished to go further paid a higher fee and went on, and under the system some of the poorest men in Scotland had been able to rise to the highest positions both in the academical institutions of the country and in the service of the State. He was himself acquainted with many men who had risen to distinguished positions in the law, the Church, and the State, who derived the whole of their education at the beginning of their lives in the parish schools of Scotland. He would assure his right rev. Friend that none of the evils he feared had been experienced in Scotland. On the contrary, it had been recognized that the vitality of the country had been immensely improved by the fact that the teachers had been in the habit of instructing their classes in the higher subjects. There was another point to which he wished to direct attention, and that was the hard and sharp line which his right rev. Friend and the noble Lord opposite would place between the lower and the middle classes. There was in nature none, and there should be none in education. The classes in nature graduated into each other. If this Motion passed with regard to the elementary schools, a poor man would have no chance for even interesting his child in regard to any of these higher branches of education. It seemed to him that there would thus be a great hardship to the working classes. Let them look at the Schedule of Instruction that had been spoken of. There was English literature. Was it not possible to teach English literature in the course of school reading? There was mathematics, which untouched to avoid controversy; but as the late Government were committed to the improvement which he asked, he had only to adopt the same view to avoid controversy, which the retention of the 4th Schedule raised. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that the Fourth Schedule be omitted from the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education and now lying on the Table of this House.—(The Lord Norton.)

THE BISHOP OF EXETER supported the Motion. He shared in the opinion of the noble Lord as to the direction in which the Education Department was drifting. Indeed, he thought the noble Lord had not expressed that opinion as strongly as the occasion demanded; because, if Parliament did not interfere now, interference would be impossible in a short time more. Therefore, he thought that in the introduction of those subjects there was no departure from the original intentions of the Legislature; but he was of opinion that the introduction of the subjects in the 4th Schedule was a serious injury to the imparting of elementary instruction. Such systematic smattering did not cultivate the intelligence of the child, but merely cultivated its memory in filling it with a knowledge which well deserved to be called "cram," because in a very little time afterwards it was entirely forgotten. Another evil arising from the introduction of those subjects was the demand for masters who could teach them in the elementary schools to the exclusion of masters who could not, but who might be very much better fitted to give elementary instruction, because elementary teachers were not improved by a superficial knowledge of such subjects. He was for having a provision by which children who exhibited superior ability in the elementary schools might have an opening through which they might rise to superior branches of education; but to secure that, there was not the least designed as a basis on which some additional structures might be built. But who had provided these additions to the present structure? Was it some enthusiasts in the cause of education? No, far from it. The proposal was made, not by himself, as suggested by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), but by the Conservative Government. As to those additional subjects—such as geography, history, &c.—the introduction of which had been objected to by noble Lords opposite, it was not the Liberal Government, but the noble Duke opposite who was responsible for having made payments in respect of those subjects. Those innovations were not brought forward by him, but by his successor in Office. By whom was this further addition then before their Lordships introduced? By the noble Duke opposite. The noble Lord then read extracts from the Code of 1880 in which it appeared that it was thought desirable that some discretion in dealing with the additional subjects should be intrusted to the teachers in elementary schools. It seemed, therefore, that the noble Duke opposite was responsible for these additions, as they were found for the first time in the Code for 1880. His noble Friend the President of the Council naturally objected to be called upon to make a retrograde step. It seemed to him that after a measure of that sort had been carried by their political opponents it scarcely became the Liberal Government to go backwards in the cause of education. It was objected that the province of middle-class schools was being interfered with. But there was no satisfactory system of middle-class education in existence. And it must not be forgotten that the endowed schools were very unequally distributed as regarded the different parts of the country, and that schools originally intended for the poor had been appropriated to the use of the rich. Nor must it be imagined that the additional subjects were taught indiscriminately, and that the sons of rustics were made to attempt tasks in which they could not succeed. To whom, then, were the extra subjects taught? He thought it would be found that they were almost exclusively confined to those who intended to devote themselves to the profession of teaching, and who completed their education for that purpose in Training Colleges. Nor could the cost of such further instruction be objected to on the ground of the additional burden to the rates, for the persons who availed themselves of it were, for the most part, ratepayers of the middle-class. This Resolution could not be passed without interfering with the perfected arrangements of years. He hoped they would not close down the hatches on the largest class of our population. There were three counties in Scotland—Aberdeen, Banff, and Moray—which had, owing to the Dick and other bequests, applied themselves to paying greater salaries to teachers of higher qualifications, and special advantages in regard to secondary teaching in the parish schools. He had attended these schools, and had seen children in them able to construe Latin and read German better than children of the same age of the higher classes in England. Could it be said that these counties had not been benefited by this? He hoped the House would not undo the work which had been initiated by the late Government, and that any retrograde step would be looked upon with great jealousy by their Lordships. He felt sure that much disappointment would be felt in the country if they did not go on in the course upon which they had entered.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he felt surprised, after hearing the speech of his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, that the noble Duke could have been a Member of the Cabinet which passed the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, and the Elementary Education Act of 1870, both based on principles, not only different, but absolutely opposed, to those which he had just so eloquently defended. The Endowed Schools Act professed in its Preamble to be founded on the statesmanlike Report of the School Inquiry Commissioners, which was based upon a long and exhaustive investigation made by themselves, and by travelling Assistant Commissioners, into the state of secondary and middle-class education at home and abroad; and that Report most positively recommended the maintenance and extension, but improved and invigorated, of secondary as distinguished from elementary education in schools quite distinct from elementary schools. The Elementary Schools Act of 1870, to which the noble Duke was equally a party, professed to be intended had long been a branch taught in the Scotch schools. Some of the poorer children rose in mathematics sufficiently high to enable them to enter the Scotch Universities. Greek was admitted here; but both Latin and Greek had long been taught in the parish schools. His noble Friend (Viscount Sherbrooke), who was so efficient in the learned languages, had in many recent speeches decried the utility of instruction in these languages as given in schools of this kind; and he (the Duke of Argyll) did not deny that they were of comparatively limited use, because it was most important that those parents who chose to have their children educated should have a little instruction given to them in French and German and other modern languages. They were simply taught, and were most useful in their application in the intercourse of life. As to the principles of mechanics, these might have a powerful application in after life, and as to animal physiology, botany, &c., these were permissive; but what more useful branches of knowledge could there be? In many of the parish schools of Scotland botany, which had only recently been introduced, excited the greatest interest. With regard to the effect upon the masters, he must say he could hardly understand how any intelligent man, or any man of education, could retain his reason if he was obliged to grind for ever at the three R's. He thoroughly believed it was immensely for the advantage of the teachers that they should have the intellectual relief, and the intellectual delight of occasionally going to the other subjects, and teaching some of the more intelligent and ambitious the higher branches. He maintained that in this Code his noble Friend was simply following at a long distance behind in the course which for 200 years had been taken in Scotland. In that country they had experienced none of the evils feared by his right rev. Friend. He agreed with the statement that it was impossible to conduct secondary education as it should be conducted in these schools, and that the money of the State should not be given, properly speaking, to the teaching of secondary education; but he thought the line could not be drawn so sharply either between the classes or the subjects as the right rev. Prelate and the noble Lord advocated. He did earnestly hope that this House would not, as regarded the education of England, put a stop to an attempt to introduce some portion, at least, of the system of education which had been one of the great national blessings of Scotland.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET confessed that he was astonished at the speech of the noble Duke. If the system pointed out by him was to go on in England all classes would be obliged to be educated together; but the fact was the system now proposed by the Department had entirely outgrown the intentions of Parliament. Could anybody seriously contend that boys in the national schools should be taught to read by making them learn Latin? The noble Duke had told them that the subjects now objected to had been taught in Scotland for the last 300 years; but surely they did not teach geology and German in Scotland 300 years ago. Boys in the national schools ought to be taught what would be useful to them in their station in life, and not what made them unfit for their position. When the Colonies wanted emigrants from this country they said—"Don't send us any scholars; send us men with strong arms and legs." Under the present Code a child could be kept at school until 18 years of age, by which time he was too old for a trade. As to the engineers and other professional men who had risen from humble life, they had risen by their own energies, and such men would continue to rise by their own exertions, without such education as that in the 4th Schedule being provided in the elementary schools. If that Schedule should be insisted upon, and teachers with high salaries appointed to rural schools, there would be much discontent amongst the ratepayers of the country generally.

LORD ABERDARE said, he was not astonished, like the noble Duke, at the speeches they had heard, because he had long been used to hear such distortions of the subject. He wished to bring the House to what was the real subject before the House. He was most anxious that justice should be done to those to whom it was due. He was most desirous that nothing should be done to impair the usefulness of the Revised Code. That Code had been highly useful as an instrument of education; but it was not intended to be the be-all and the end-all on the subject. It was designed as a basis on which some additional structures might be built. But who had provided these additions to the present structure? Was it some enthusiasts in the cause of education? No, far from it. The proposal was made, not by himself, as suggested by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), but by the Conservative Government. As to those additional subjects—such as geography, history, &c.—the introduction of which had been objected to by noble Lords opposite, it was not the Liberal Government, but the noble Duke opposite who was responsible for having made payments in respect of those subjects. Those innovations were not brought forward by him, but by his successor in Office. By whom was this further addition then before their Lordships introduced? By the noble Duke opposite. The noble Lord then read extracts from the Code of 1880 in which it appeared that it was thought desirable that some discretion in dealing with the additional subjects should be intrusted to the teachers in elementary schools. It seemed, therefore, that the noble Duke opposite was responsible for these additions, as they were found for the first time in the Code for 1880. His noble Friend the President of the Council naturally objected to be called upon to make a retrograde step. It seemed to him that after a measure of that sort had been carried by their political opponents it scarcely became the Liberal Government to go backwards in the cause of education. It was objected that the province of middle-class schools was being interfered with. But there was no satisfactory system of middle-class education in existence. And it must not be forgotten that the endowed schools were very unequally distributed as regarded the different parts of the country, and that schools originally intended for the poor had been appropriated to the use of the rich. Nor must it be imagined that the additional subjects were taught indiscriminately, and that the sons of rustics were made to attempt tasks in which they could not succeed. To whom, then, were the extra subjects taught? He thought it would be found that they were almost exclusively confined to those who intended to devote themselves to the profession of teaching, and who completed their education for that purpose in Training Colleges. Nor could the cost of such further instruction be objected to on the ground of the additional burden to the rates, for the persons who availed themselves of it were, for the most part, ratepayers of the middle-class. This Resolution could not be passed without interfering with the perfected arrangements of years. He hoped they would not close down the hatches on the largest class of our population. There were three counties in Scotland—Aberdeen, Banff, and Moray—which had, owing to the Dick and other bequests, applied themselves to paying greater salaries to teachers of higher qualifications, and special advantages in regard to secondary teaching in the parish schools. He had attended these schools, and had seen children in them able to construe Latin and read German better than children of the same age of the higher classes in England. Could it be said that these counties had not been benefited by this? He hoped the House would not undo the work which had been initiated by the late Government, and that any retrograde step would be looked upon with great jealousy by their Lordships. He felt sure that much disappointment would be felt in the country if they did not go on in the course upon which they had entered.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he felt surprised, after hearing the speech of his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, that the noble Duke could have been a Member of the Cabinet which passed the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, and the Elementary Education Act of 1870, both based on principles, not only different, but absolutely opposed, to those which he had just so eloquently defended. The Endowed Schools Act professed in its Preamble to be founded on the statesmanlike Report of the School Inquiry Commissioners, which was based upon a long and exhaustive investigation made by themselves, and by travelling Assistant Commissioners, into the state of secondary and middle-class education at home and abroad; and that Report most positively recommended the maintenance and extension, but improved and invigorated, of secondary as distinguished from elementary education in schools quite distinct from elementary schools. The Elementary Schools Act of 1870, to which the noble Duke was equally a party, professed to be intended only to secure to all the children in the land instruction in the three R's, omitting, unfortunately, the fourth R—Religion. And that it was intended to do no more was conclusively proved by its movers announcing that the probable cost of education under it to the ratepayers would certainly not exceed 3*d.* in the pound. If the noble Duke's present views were then entertained by himself and other Members of that Cabinet, then it could not be denied that consciously or unconsciously they had induced Parliament to pass those two Acts under erroneous impressions resulting from their delusive professions. It was quite true that the difficulty in which the country was placed resulted, as he had Session after Session tried to impress upon the House, from Mr. Gladstone's Government, while professing to carry out the recommendations of Lord Taunton's Commission, having omitted the most important of them—that upon which, in the words of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, whom they appointed to carry out the Act, the plan of the Schools Inquiry Commission mainly rested. He meant the establishment of provincial authorities, who would have administered the £20,000,000 of educational endowments much more advantageously than, by their own confession, the Endowed or Charity Commissioners without their aid had been able to do; and would have supplied exactly that organization, for want of which secondary education in England was suffering in the way so vividly described by the right rev. Prelate. The secondary education of this country had remained unorganized; and now step by step, through the instrumentality of the last two centralizing Governments, followed by the present centralizing Government, an attempt was being made by the very able and earnest permanent officials of the Council Office to get into the hands of that Government Department the regulation and control of the whole of the secondary education, as they had already succeeded in getting that of the primary education of the country. The management would generally continue, as under successive chiefs of the Department it had practically been, in the hands of those permanent officials, conscientiously bureaucratic enthusiasts. But every now and then, upon some change of Government, some Minister might be placed at the head of the Department, who would suddenly make enormous changes in the educational system of the country—secondary as well as elementary. They would have education in England assimilated, as regards State interference, to the education in France, and that quite needlessly. For with good local organization, our Universities, not unaffected by the deliberate tide of public opinion, though exempt from the direct action of the sudden revulsion of political feelings which so powerfully affect the Government of the day, might supply much of that useful guidance and influence to the secondary education which they had long so powerfully exerted over the highest education of the country. The noble Duke said that Scotland had had a complete system of education for 300 years of primary schools, secondary schools, and Universities. But of these the State only regulated the primary or elementary schools. Do not let it be supposed that the sum granted for these special subjects at all adequately represented the enormous additional expense which the system would entail. The grants under the 4th Schedule represented only a very small part of the extra expense which it entailed in the higher salaries reasonably required for masters competent to teach those subjects in the village schools throughout the country to an utterly insignificant number of children who might learn those subjects far better and cheaper in middle-class schools, if poor, with the aid of Exhibitions; if of the middle class, defraying the cost of their education. The consequence of the present system would be that they would find the self-reliant, self-supporting character of the middle class very much sapped by means of these educational grants—giving them an education out of the rates and taxes at very much less than the cost price; and this self-reliant spirit would be sapped in spite of all they heard of the strongly dispauperizing influences of this higher education. Do not let it be said that those who advocate some restrictions on the utterly unreasonable development recently given to the system, and now proposed to be continued by the present Government, were opposed to the upward progress of the children of the wage class. In the same admirable Report Lord Taunton's Commission specially recommended that a sufficient part Department in defining what primary education was. He held in his hand a letter from one of the chief school boards in England, and one which had received the panegyrics and encomiums of a late Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton). That letter said that of all the children in the primary schools at Sheffield only 15 were over 14 years of age. There was another test as to whether the primary schools were being diverted from their proper purpose. They had analyzed the occupations of the fathers of all the children who were in the higher grade schools, and by far the great majority of the children were children of artizans. He admitted that in Birmingham there was a different state of things, because there was a secondary school in the town which gave education to poor children; but, at the same time, the Birmingham School Board was one of the most influential in the country, and would not take into their schools children above a certain age. In that town there were 55 school departments, with an attendance of 21,947 children, and the total number of children over 14 years of age was only 150. The number of children in the schools of England above 14 years of age was exceedingly small. It was said that by encouraging secondary instruction in elementary schools they were increasing the expenses of the State. He thought they must not grudge an increased expenditure for giving sufficient and proper education to the children throughout the country. It had been said by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) that the secondary education given in the schools was a systematic smattering of science; but he (Earl Spencer) on the other hand, contended that though many of the subjects comprised in the 4th Schedule had long names they were still very simple, and that some of them were of a character which would specially interest agricultural children. He would be the first to oppose these subjects being taught in the elementary schools if he considered the result would be simply "cram"; but if the regulations were carefully examined it would be found that every kind of condition and stipulation was put upon the grant to prevent the occurrence of such a result. A noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) attacked geology. He would venture to correct his noble Friend by saying that geology was not one of the subjects mentioned in the Schedule referred to. He would remind the noble Duke of what Dr. Johnson said. He said "that if they gave a child in a village a gold laced waistcoat they made him very conceited; but if they gave all the children in the village gold laced waistcoats he would no longer be conceited." If they gave education, as far as possible, to all children there would not be the danger to which the noble Duke referred. A very large proportion indeed of the children passed in reading. He maintained that he had made no alteration of any practical importance in the Code of 1879. He added certain subjects for class teaching apart from Schedule IV. in order to give more latitude to the teachers, who should not be bound to teach subjects in which they had no interest whatever. Since the last debate took place on this subject Her Majesty's Government had received 17 Memorials from important school boards against the limit of age to 14 years, and from six school boards against any alteration as to specific subjects in Standard IV. These were expressions of opinion from very important educational centres; and were they, he asked, to disregard them? The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had taken up a position which he found it difficult to understand. The noble Duke would vote for the omission of Schedule IV. from the Code. That Schedule had been first introduced into it when the noble Duke was Lord President. Why did he now propose to strike out these subjects, which had been for five years or more part of the education of the country? He surely ought rather to have moved an Amendment to put in the Resolutions, which in the Code now in the title had been omitted. It had been stated in the debate that Scholarships had been provided for the children of poor parents; but they were in very few instances available for lower class children, however deserving they might be, and these would be deprived of all chance of any high grade of education if the Government were to act on the advice given by the noble Duke. For his part, he protested against such a course being adopted. It would have an exceedingly bad effect on the country, and would place the labouring and manufacturing classes at a great disadvantage, not only as compared with the Scotch, who, as his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) had said, had long ago enjoyed higher education in their primary schools, but also as compared with the working classes of other countries. He, therefore, implored their Lordships not to take the step to which they had been invited. He would take care to inquire fully into the subject, and might say that he did not at all disparage the opinions that had been expressed in the course of the debate; and if he should come to the conclusion that it was desirable to propose some condition in order to prevent our drifting into secondary education in elementary schools, he certainly should not shrink from doing so.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

The said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY — EXTENSION OF HOURS OF ADMISSION.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE moved for Copies of the Resolution passed by the Trustees of the National Gallery, with their explanatory remarks, on the question of keeping the Gallery open throughout the year, and the admission of the public on students' days. The noble Viscount admitted that the que-tion was one of much difficulty and delicacy; but said he understood that the Trustees, though not desiring to change the existing system, were anxious to act up to the spirit of any deliberately expressed opinion of Parliament in reference to the question.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was not able to give the noble Viscount any positive assurance as to the course which Her Majesty's Government might think it necessary to take; but he could, at any rate, promise that the question should have full and careful consideration.

Motion agreed to.

BURIALS BILL.

(nos. 73, 86.) REPORT.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, there was a strong feeling throughout the country that, after the passing of that Bill, the cost of maintaining the burial-grounds should be put upon some public rate. He did not propose any Amendment in this direction himself; he thought there were obvious objections, which the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack would be able to adduce; but he had brought forward the question as it had been strongly pressed upon him by others.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not aware that the passing of this Bill would increase the expense of maintaining the churchyards, or that it could, therefore, be necessary to change the present system of providing for the cost. He did not say that, if it were necessary, Parliament might not be willing to provide for the maintenance of churchyards still in use, as well as of those which had been closed by public authority, though the cases were substantially different. But, before he could come to the conclusion that this was desirable, he must be satisfied that the conditions, on which alone Parliament could be expected to agree to it, would be generally acceptable to the clergy. If the cost of maintenance was put upon a public rate, the management of the churchyards must be taken out of the hands of the parochial clergy, who took a very great interest in them, and put in charge of a public body elected by the ratepayers, a course which he should not himself wish to see adopted, unless it could be proved to be necessary, or, at least, very generally desired by Church people, which he did not believe to be the case.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK agreed with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in thinking that it would be unwise to take any step which could have the effect of taking the management of the churchyards out of the hands of the parochial clergy.

Amendments reported (according to Order.

Clause 1 (After passing of Act, notice may be given that burial will take place in churchyard or graveyard without the rites of the Church of England. Graveyard to include cemetery).

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendments made:—

In page 1, leave out after ("writing") in line 10 to ("Act") in line 12 inclusive; after line 25 insert—

"Such notice shall be in writing, plainly signed with the name and stating the address of the person giving it, and shall be in the form or to the effect of Schedule (A.) annexed to this Act; "

"Save as herein provided, the word 'graveyard' in this Act shall mean any burial ground or cemetery vested in any burial board, or provided under any Act relating to the burial of the dead, in which the parishioners or inhabitants of any parish or ecclesiastical district have rights of burial, and of which no part is left unconsecrated; and in the case of any such burial ground or cemetery, if a chaplain is appointed to perform the burial service of the Church of England therein, such chaplain shall be deemed to be the incumbent or officiating minister, to whom notice is to be given under this Act; and such notice as aforesaid shall also be given to the clerk of the burial board, if any, in whom any such burial ground or cemetery may be vested."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Time of burial to be stated, subject to variation).

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendment made in page 2, line 22, before ("usual"), by inserting ("address or").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Burial may be without religious service).

Moved, in page 3, line 20, to leave out all the words after ("Christian") to the end of the clause, and re-insert them with the exception of the words ("Provided always") as a separate clause to follow Clause 6.—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was still of opinion that the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mount Edgcombe) was objectionable, inasmuch as the Act containing it would not put an end to the difficulty, but would keep the question open in every parish where there was an unconsecrated burial ground, and cause an agitation for an unconsecrated burial ground where one did not now exist. Where there was no unconsecrated ground every effort would be made to get a little bit, in order to prevent Nonconformists being buried in the churchyards.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM believed that the retention of the Amendment, instead of creating controversies as dreaded by the most rev. Primate, would promote good feeling and harmony between different denominations of Christians throughout the country. He therefore supported the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON also feared that the Amendment would perpetuate the grievance, because Dissenters having possessed and used the right of burial in the churchyards, would lose it when a cemetery was made, so that families would not be buried together.

THE EARL OF MOUNT EDGCOMBE thought that the Amendment would work well, and he hoped that it would be agreed to, subject to an alteration, that the Act in this respect should not come into operation until July 1881.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY thought that some delay in bringing the Act into operation would be grateful to many members of the Church.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he would consider the suggestion.

Amendment agreed to ; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

New clause (Act to apply only to parish, &c., where no unconsecrated burial ground for parishioners) agreed to, and inserted in the Bill.

Clause 7 (Burials to be conducted in a decent and orderly manner, and without obstruction).

Moved, after clause, to insert the following clause:—

(Powers for prevention of disorder.)

"All powers and authorities now existing by law for the preservation of order, and for the prevention and punishment of disorderly behaviour in any churchyard or graveyard may be exercised, in any case of burial under this Act, in the same manner and by the same persons as if the same had been a burial according to the rites of the Church of England."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Amendment agreed to ; clause inserted accordingly.

Clause 8 (Act not to give right of burial where no previous right existed).

Moved, That the following words be added to the clause:—

"Or without performance of any express condition on which, by the terms of any trust deed, any right of interment in any burial ground vested in trustees under such trust deed may have been granted."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Amendment agreed to ; words added accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Relief of clergy of Church of England from penalties in certain cases).

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendments made:—In page 5, line 17, after ("dead") insert ("the first six of which were"); line 21, leave out ("such of the same"), and after ("recommendations") leave out ("as are") and insert ("to the same effect with those"); line 27, leave out ("no") and insert ("it shall be lawful for any"); line 28, leave out from ("shall") to ("also") in line 35 inclusive, and insert—

("In any of the cases and matters provided for by the several forms of altered and additional rubrics contained in the said Schedule (C.), to act in conformity therewith without being subject to any ecclesiastical or other censure or penalty: Provided always.")

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out the clause, and insert the following clause:—

"No minister in holy orders in the Church of England shall be subject to any censure or penalty for declining to officiate in any case with the service prescribed by law for the burial of the dead according to the rites of the said church in any churchyard, burial ground, or cemetery. It shall not be unlawful for the minister, at the request or with the consent of the kindred or friends of the deceased to use only the following service at the burial—prayers taken from the Book of Common Prayer and portions of Holy Scripture approved by the Ordinary,"

said, the schedule to which the clause referred was objectionable, in that it altered the rubrics in a partial manner. An alteration of the rubrics was an extreme course, not to be adopted without great care, and should make the rubric as perfect as possible. If this Amendment were accepted, he should move the omission of the schedule also. The grievances of the laity had to be considered, but he thought those of the clergy ought to be regarded. The Bill would authorize three or four different burial services. There was, first, the ordinary burial service; second, a shorter service, which was to be used in cases where the clergyman might object to use the present service, when, perhaps, the deceased had been a drunkard, or otherwise disreputable; thirdly, there was the service over excommunicated or unbaptized persons, or those who had laid violent hands on themselves. He objected to placing the unbaptized in the same category with the excommunicated or suicides; and as to the second kind of service, he thought difficulties would arise which his proposal would relieve the clergy of and transfer to the friends of the deceased. Both clause and schedule were designed to relieve the clergyman from the necessity of reading the service where he had conscientious objections to it, and he proposed to give him relief in a different way. His next objection to the schedule was that there was very little chance of its passing the House of Commons. The Bill would be sent back to their Lordships with all those clauses gone which relieved the consciences of the clergy, and simply that portion of the Bill retained which allowed other services than those of the Church of England to be performed in the churchyard. It would then, no doubt, be in their Lordships' discretion to deal with the Bill as they thought fit; but suppose they threw out the Bill, they would have this discussion renewed next year, and that he (the Earl of Camperdown) would be very sorry to see. If they were to give relief to the clergy, let them do it in a way that would be effectual, and in the way that the clergy wished. The clause he proposed would enable them to decline, if they chose, to perform the service over a deceased person. For the first time, ministers of other denominations, equally with the clergymen of the Church of England, were to be allowed to enter the churchyard and perform services. The responsibility for the conduct of the funerals was transferred from the clergyman to the friends of the deceased. Under these circumstances, he could not see any good reason why they should say to the clergyman of the Church of England alone that he must read the service whenever he was called upon. Any other clergyman could decline, and why should not the clergyman of the Church of England? In the second part of the clause he provided for the case of the unbaptized, where the clergyman might feel unwilling to read the whole service, but was perfectly ready to use a shorter form of service. He could not conceive that in the Commons there would be any difficulty in accepting the clause he proposed. He wished to deal with the clergy as reasonable and sensible men, and he could not help feeling that many of their difficulties had arisen from the rubrics. If Parliament enabled the clergy to exercise their discretion, he did not think the liberty would be abused. The noble Earl concluded by moving the Amendment.

Moved, to leave out Clause 12, and insert the following Clause:—

"No minister in holy orders of the Church of England shall be subject to any censure or penalty for declining to officiate in any case with the service prescribed by law for the burial of the dead according to the rites of the said church in any churchyard, burial ground, or cemetery.

"It shall not be unlawful for any minister, at the request or with the consent of the kindred or friends of the deceased, to use only the following service at the burial: Prayers taken from the Book of Common Prayer and portions of Holy Scripture approved by the Ordinary."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) had made a very bold proposal. It amounted to nothing less than this—that every clergyman might refuse to perform the burial office whenever he pleased; that the laity no longer should have the right to the services of the clergy in the burial office. If Convocation did not see its way to propose anything of the kind, it could scarcely be thought probable that Parliament would be induced to pass it. The noble Earl seemed to fear that the other House would not agree to the clause as it stood. He hoped there was no sufficient reason for that fear. But, if there was, the more violent course proposed by the noble Earl would have still less likelihood to being agreed to. If they were to allow the parish clergyman to have a right to refuse to perform the service, there should, at least, be given a right to any other clergyman of the Church of England, who was ready to do so, to perform that service in the absence of the clergyman who originally refused. That, the noble Earl's Amendment did not give; but, on the contrary, it gave to the parish clergyman an unbounded discretion to do as he liked as to performing or not performing the service, and did not provide for any substitute, if he refused.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY gave his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) credit for desiring to confer a boon upon the clergy; but he was afraid it was one which the clergy would have serious difficulty in accepting. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack so fully expressed his (the Archbishop of Canterbury's) views, that he need not further refer to the clause.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, the following clause was inserted, after Clause 12:—

(Saving as to Ministers of Church of England.)

"Save as in this Act expressly provided as to ministers of the Church of England, nothing herein contained shall authorise or enable any minister who shall not have become a declared member of any other Church or denomination, or have executed a deed of relinquishment under the "Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870," to do any act which he would not by law have been authorised or enabled to do if this Act had not passed, or to exempt him from any censure or penalty in respect thereof."

On the Motion of The LORD CHANCELLOR, the following Amendment made:—In Schedule C, leave out paragraph 7.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next, and to be printed as amended. (No. 89.)

REPORTING.

Message from The Lords [15th June], requesting this House to give leave to Peter Stewart Macliver, esquire, to attend as a Witness before the Select Committee appointed by the House of Lords on Reporting, considered:—Leave given.

QUESTIONS.

FISHERY PIERS (IRELAND).

MR. LEA asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If it is a fact that the sanction of the Treasury was given some time ago for Grants towards three piers in county Donegal:—at Ballysaggart, Poalhurrin, and Bunnatroohan; that the one-fourth required was paid to the Board of Works, and all preliminaries required by the Act complied with; and, if so, what reason exists for delay in commencing works in those localities where employment is so much required?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the preliminaries in respect of the piers mentioned were completed on the 14th of April, the Treasury having previously given their sanction for grants in aid, and the local contribution having been paid in. Difficulties have, however, been met with in obtaining contracts for the works; but contracts were entered into for Bunnatroohan on the 28th of May, for Ballysaggart on the 1st of June, and for Poalhurrin on the 11th of June. The contractors are now collecting materials for the works, and the Board of Works will urge upon them the desirability of proceeding with them as soon as possible.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Departmental Committee appointed to report on the most desirable places on the Irish Coast for the construction of Fishery Piers and Harbours had yet made a report; and, if not, when they may be expected to do so; and, whether the Board of Works will be in a position to secure the Canadian Grants by having the works which shall be decided on proceeded with before the 1st of August?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Committee had not yet made their Report, as they had very many applications to take into their consideration. They were, however, quite aware of the necessity which existed for expedition, and he had no doubt that they would arrive at a conclusion as soon as possible. In answer to the second Question, he had to state that it would depend entirely on whether the Relief of Distress Bill would be passed in sufficient time to enable the preparatory notices to be given whether the works would be proceeded with before the date named.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, as the present was the second time he had asked the right hon. Gentleman a Question about the Committee, he suspected it was doing absolutely nothing. He would now ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Committee was actually sitting, and had taken any steps to carry out the object for which it was appointed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that unofficially every Member of the Committee was working in the matter, although he was not sure in the case of the Representative of the Admiralty. Whether the Committee had held an official meeting or not he did not know; but there was not, at all events, the slightest danger that any of the Canadian grants would be lost owing to any remissness in the action of the Committee.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER gave Notice that on the Motion for going into Committee on the Irish Relief Bill he would call attention to the inefficiency of the Irish Fishery Piers Departmental Committee, and to the necessity of improving the machinery for administering the provisions of that Bill, part of which had reference to this Irish Fishery Committee.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—RELIEF WORKS IN GALWAY.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the ordnance map showing the relief works authorised by the Government in the county of Galway up to the 16th June, together with a Return of the number and estimated cost of the works presented for at the Special Sessions in each of the baronies of Ballynahinch, Moycullen, and Ross; and a Return of the number of these works passed by the Board of Works, but subsequently rejected by the Local Government Board, together with their estimated cost, and showing also the works allowed by the Government and actually in progress, with the number of men employed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I would ask the hon. Gentleman to put the Question on Monday, as I only saw the Notice this morning, and have not had time to communicate with my noble Friend on the subject.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA"—THE PAPERS.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the instructions issued to the Court of inquiry on the loss of H.M.S. "Atalanta?"

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, there will be no difficulty in producing the instructions referred to; and if the hon. Member will move for them, they shall be laid on the Table of the House.

DISTRESS (IRELAND).

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a circular issued by the authority of the Lord Lieutenant bearing date 9th June inst and addressed, in the form of instructions, to the justices and associated cesspayers at extraordinary baronial presentment sessions, and which directs that, where no tender for the execution of certain works shall have been accepted, the secretary of the grand jury shall give the work in charge to the county surveyor, who is required forthwith to execute the same; whether such direction does not directly conflict with the discretion of the legally constituted tribunal; and, whether he will take steps to procure the recall of the circular?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have seen the circular, and, in fact, I may say I am responsible for it. The directions contained in it will not conflict with the discretion of any legally constituted tribunal, and I have no intention to take any steps to procure its recall. It was issued by the Lord Lieutenant under the Relief of Distress Act of 1880, to avoid the evil of any delay in proceeding with the relief works already authorized at baronial sessions.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL— GOVERNMENT DOCKYARDS.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Attorney General, If persons that are employed in the dockyard and other public works of the Government fall within the provisions of the Employers' Liability Bill; and, if they do not, if he would explain why are they excluded from the protection intended for other workmen?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, the workmen referred to did not come within the provisions of the Bill. It was not intended that they should be included in its provisions, for it was a well-known legal principle that the Crown could not be proceeded against by a subject in respect of any alleged wrong; so that if workmen in the Government Dockyards were brought within the scope of the Bill, they would be placed in a better position than the rest of the public.

THE IRISH LAND ACT, 1870.

MR. FINIGAN begged to give Notice that he should ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he would lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Letter which he referred to on Thursday, in his reply to a Question, addressed to the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the President of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, intimating the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Special Royal Commission to inquire into the Irish Land Act of 1870, and which statement was laid before the Royal Commission at the meeting on Wednesday.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he might save his hon. Friend some trouble by stating that if he liked to move for it, there would be no objection to its production.

MR. SEXTON said, that, perhaps, the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not object to state whether the Royal Commission would be instructed to report with a view to legislation next year?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that he had not heard of the Question until that morning, so he must ask if it appeared in the Notice Paper yesterday?

MR. SEXTON: I gave the Notice yesterday.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I must ask for it to be placed upon the Paper in the usual course.

HARES AND RABBITS BILL.

MR. HENEAGE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When he proposes to take the adjourned discussion on the Hares and Rabbits Bill; and, whether he will place it as a first Order for some day previous to the commencement of Quarter Sessions?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that the state of Public Business did not allow him at present to fix a day for proceeding with the adjourned discussion on this Bill. When the Government were able to fix a day, they would endeavour to fix it in such a way as to meet the convenience of all hon. Members who were particularly interested in the measure.

THE TREATY OF BERLIN—EXECUTION OF THE ARTICLES.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to enforce the fulfilment of those provisions of the Treaty of Berlin which ensure justice to Turkey and to the Mussulman population equally with those provisions which deprive the Ottoman Empire of portions of its territory; whether Her Majesty's Government will enforce the establishment of Batoum as a free port and the demolition of the new Russian fortifications, the removal of the Russo-Bulgarian flotilla from the Danube, the dismissal of Russian officers and soldiers from the Bulgarian forces, the demolition of the fortresses in Bulgaria, especially of Schunla, Varna, Rustchuk, and Silestria, the garrisonry of the Balkans by Ottoman troops; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take effectual measures to restore the remnant of the Mussulman population of Bulgaria and of Eastern Roumelia to their homes and property, and to secure adequate protection for their persons and property?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I hope the hon. Gentleman, as he has only very recently entered this House, will excuse me if I suggest to him a change in the method of framing his Questions. It is very inconvenient to the House that a Minister who has to answer a Question should, instead of giving a direct and simple answer, be compelled to enter into explanations for the purpose of obviating inferences which otherwise must necessarily be drawn. In answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government have never made any declaration whatever about enforcing any of the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I am quite willing to substitute the words "press for," in the place of "enforce."

MR. GLADSTONE: It is undoubtedly our intention to proceed with perfect impartiality as between Turkey and Russia, as between the Mussulman and Christian populations in regard to the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. In the second paragraph of his Question, the hon. Member enumerates various particulars with regard to which I am not cognizant of the facts. There has been up to the present time nothing like a violation of the Treaty of Berlin. No intelligence has reached me to the effect that Batoum is not established as a free port. I know nothing on the subject. It is our intention, with regard to the whole of these subjects, to adhere, as far as we are able, both in the letter and in the spirit, to the Treaty of Berlin. There is one point, I believe, provided for by the Treaty of Berlin with regard to the demolition of fortresses. That is a matter of some expense and difficulty, and there may be some pleas for time, which itself, in some respects, does the work of demolition. At the same time, I agree that the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin ought to be faithfully and fully carried out in that respect. As regards the last paragraph of the Question, I have to say that it is the business of the Turkish Government to send back to Eastern Roumelia and to Bulgaria the refugees whom, most unhappily, during the war the Turkish Government used the strongest measures to remove from the country. If Her Majesty's Government learn that the return of these refugees is unduly obstructed or resisted by the Governments of Bulgaria or Eastern Roumelia when they are duly sent back with proper provisions for their establishment, undoubtedly it will be the duty of the Government to use their best exertions to procure their return and their equitable treatment.

MR. J. COWEN: Sir, the announcement just made by the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government would insist upon the Treaty of Berlin being carried out irrespective of nationalities and creeds, must have been received by the House with satisfaction. Now, I wish to ask this Question. Her Majesty's Government, with the other Powers of Europe at the Conference now sitting, are seeking to extend the territory of Greece and to confirm the boundaries of Montenegro. In doing so, they must necessarily encroach upon the nationality of Albania; and I should like to learn from the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government are prepared, in seeking to extend the territories of the Greeks and Montenegrins, to pay due regard to as distinct and as noble a State as now exists in Europe, and which has nothing in common in blood, language, or manners with its neighbours? ["Order!"] I was only stating enough to explain my Question. I simply wish to ask, Whether, in seeking to extend Montenegrin territory in the north and Greek territory in the south, regard will be had to the nationality in the centre?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think the Question and criticism of the hon. Member really amounts to this—whether, in my answer to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), I meant what I said, or did not. Of course, if I meant what I said, we are bound to have the same fair regard to all the facts of the case, and to the element of nationality and to the peculiar circumstances of Albania, as we should do in reference to any other portion of territory.

GLOUCESTER ELECTION.

MR. MONK: As I do not see the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) in his place, I beg to give Notice of a Question which I intended to ask him to-day. The noble Lord did not adopt the usual practice of giving Notice to an hon. Member that he would on a future day bring forward what he was pleased to call “the grave imputation of the learned Judge” on the conduct of that Member. Therefore, I give Notice that on Monday I will ask the noble Lord why he defers for a whole week the Motion of which he has given Notice, and which now stands on the Order Book, instead of bringing it forward at the earliest possible opportunity?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

[BILL 205.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. PARNELL said, he hoped the Chief Secretary for Ireland would abandon his intention of proceeding with that stage of the Bill at present, because he thought the Irish Members should have an opportunity of considering the situation and line of action they proposed with regard to the Bill. It was important they should know the intention of Government in the matter, both as regarded the interests of Ireland and the saving of the time of the House. If they were compelled to go into a premature discussion upon the Committee stage of that Bill at that moment, they might be obliged to give the debate an extent and a tendency which they might find themselves in a position to avoid hereafter. The course of the Government, in any case, was unusual. The second reading of the Bill was taken last night after full and fair time had been allowed for its consideration, and then the Committee stage was put down for to-day, without affording any time to Members to place Amendments upon the Notice Paper. He saw, however, that some Members, endowed with greater activity than the generality of Irish Members, did succeed, in the five minutes that had elapsed between the second reading and the rising of the House, in placing some Amendments upon the Notice Paper; but a very large number of Amendments which had been prepared by the Irish Members it was utterly impossible to place on the Paper. It had always been the custom of the House to take the Motion for going into Committee on a Bill at a time when it was possible that Amendments might appear on the Notice Paper; but by the present action of the Government they were entirely debarred from the advantages which the Rules of the House usually afforded to Members. He thought it would be a course that would be convenient to the House to postpone the Committee on the Bill, and he asked that that should be done in the interests of Ireland. It would be in the recollection of the House that on the second reading of the Land Act Bill introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), the Government received it in a friendly spirit, and there was nothing that took place at that time that could have led the House to suppose that the Government intended subsequently to oppose it; but, after a week or so, in obedience to a pressure of a section behind the Government, the Chief Secretary for Ireland announced, without waiting to hear the reasons that might be urged in debate, that the Government could not accede to the second reading of the Bill, and stated that it was intended to amend the present measure for the re-lie of the Irish distress by the introduction of a supplementary clause giving power to County Court Judges to award compensation for eviction. The Notice of the introduction of the clause involved a very important change in the policy of the Government as regarded the relief of the distress in Ireland. It was true that the distress in Ireland could not be satisfactorily relieved without some amendment of the law between landlord and tenant; but they found in the vacillation that had marked the Government in the conduct of this matter a want of firmness, a want of belief that they had any force behind them on which they could rely, because, in obedience to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), the Government could change their policy, and abandon their intention of introducing the clause that had been announced. He found now that the subject intended to have been introduced in the Bill by the Government was to be brought forward in a fresh Bill, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given Notice. All they knew was that he had given Notice of it, though no further guarantee in respect of it. They had no surety that in a few days the right hon. Gentleman would not come and announce that owing to the pressure of Public Business he felt unable to proceed with the Bill. If they allowed the present Bill to go through without some assurance that the other Bill would not be abandoned, they might be left entirely in the lurch. Under all these circumstances, in view of all these changes of front on the part of the Government, three in number during the last three or four days, he thought the Irish Members should be afforded an opportunity of meeting together and considering what policy they would adopt on the Committee stage of the Irish Relief Bill; whether they would permit it to go through on the vague assurance they had received from the Government of the introduction of another measure of the terms of which they knew nothing, or whether they would adopt some special course. He had seen enough already to be able to indicate that it would be a saving of the time of the House to afford the Irish Members the opportunity they asked for. Even without the very exceptional circumstances he had mentioned, they were entitled by the ordinary practice of the House to more than 12 hours' Notice of the Committee stage of that important measure. The constituencies represented felt very deeply upon the matter, and would not be satisfied unless the course he proposed were adopted. He could understand the difficulties under which the Government laboured in dealing with any Irish question; he could understand that they had a majority that was not well acquainted with the condition of affairs in Ireland—not so well acquainted as even the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself—and that those difficulties only made it more difficult for the Chief Secretary to carry out his views as to what was right and proper for the government of Ireland. At the same time, the Irish Members had their difficulties; and they felt that they must stand firm in respect to this question, that they should lose no opportunity of pressing their views upon the House for endeavouring to revise the practice that formerly existed with respect to Irish affairs, and of trying to strengthen the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his good intentions with regard to the good government of the country he had adopted. He trusted, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would consent to postpone the present stage of that important measure until they had a further opportunity of considering what course they should adopt. There was no particular hurry about the matter, because the money Parliament was asked to grant was not going to buy bread for a single person wanting it in Ireland, and, as regarded the fishery piers, any period of the season would do as well for the passing of the measure. Therefore, he would ask the Chief Secretary to postpone the Committee stage of the Bill until they had an opportunity of seeing the other Relief of Distress in Ireland Bill which it was proposed to introduce, and of ascertaining whether the Government really intended to press it forward. He moved, therefore, the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the remarks of the hon. Member were doubtless inspired by admirable motives, which, however, had to be stated somewhat plainly in order to be discoverable in the general object of his speech. He was glad to hear that the hon. Member wished to strengthen the hands of the Government, but should not have inferred from the previous part of his speech that he had any such intention. He should, therefore, take no notice of the contentious portions of the hon. Member's speech, whether as regarded his comments on the action of the Government or on the prejudices which he ascribed to the majority sitting on that side of the House. The hon. Member had referred to one subject on which it was necessary that he should say a word or two. The hon. Member had stated that there was no fixity of purpose with regard to the supplemental clauses of the Bill, and that he did not know whether or not they were to be abandoned. The hon. Gentleman would be best satisfied with the reality of the intentions of the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he observed that the right hon. Gentleman had given Notice at the earliest time in his power—namely, to-night—for the introduction of the Bill. If he allowed the Bill to be read a first time to-night, it would, in the usual course, be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning. As they were pledged to assign next Tuesday morning for the consideration of the subject, the Chief Secretary would put the Bill down for that day. The hon. Member, therefore, would have the earliest opportunity of testing the views and intentions of the Government in the matter. With regard to the particular Bill before the House, the view of his right hon. Friend and the Government was that its main object was to fulfil the engagements and to redeem the pledges of the late Government, and they inferred from that fact that the main discussion upon it would be taken in Committee. His right hon. Friend had added two clauses on points he regarded as subsidiary; but, in proposing to take the Committee immediately after the second reading, his right hon. Friend was really proceeding on the principle he had stated. He was quite aware, however, that it would not be just and fair to the Irish Members to force on them a discussion of the clauses. He thought the hon. Gentleman himself last night expressed an opinion that it would be perfectly allowable to take the Committee to-day. [Mr. PARNELL dissented.] The hon. Member would see that on account of all these Irish questions they had really consigned to virtual suspension the rest of the Business of the House. Last night they devoted to a debate on the second reading; they had appropriated to-day to the Committee; and on Tuesday morning they were pledged to take into consideration and ask the decision of the House upon the matter proposed by his right hon. Friend with regard to ejections. If he understood the hon. Gentleman to speak on behalf of himself and hon. Members near him, the Government would be content if Mr. Speaker were allowed to leave the Chair; but he was not prepared at present to name a day for taking the clauses.

MR. PARNELL said, that, after the very satisfactory and kind statement of the Prime Minister, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that the difficulties in the progress of this measure ought to be very instructive to Her Majesty's Government, and teach them that when they proposed to deal with the question of the Land in Ireland their proposals ought to be of a definite character. The Government had adopted, in the construction of the Bill, the policy of their Predecessors, which appeared to be a policy of give and take, only that the giving was to the class that were in the least in need of it—namely, the landlord class. He merely made that remark because he thought the occasion called for it. In order to fulfil the promise which he made a while ago, and to justify the Notice which he gave when the right hon. Gentleman replied to him as to Irish piers and harbours, he wished to point out the great defect observable in reference to those relief measures in Ireland. There was not a single official board in Ireland that had learned the alphabet of its business—not one of them. They were simply nominations of individuals who, in the main, had no practical knowledge whatever of the subjects with which they had been charged. If the Relief Bill was to bring any advantage of an independent or substantial character to the people of Ireland, it would be the business of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to see that the provisions of the Bill were properly carried out by the Board of Works and the other authorities, without whose action the provisions of the Bill were useless. A clause in the Bill proposed to set apart the sum of £30,000 as a contribution in aid of the construction of piers and harbours in Ireland. There was a relief measure, something that was to revive the fishing industry, and what did it amount to? A paltry £30,000, as he was informed, was the sum of money already due to the Irish fisheries in consequence of the non-payment of an annual sum of £5,000. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that after putting two Questions to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, allowing a week's interval between each Question, and finding that he could discover no official evidence of that Departmental Committee having done any work, he was entitled to say it was an insult to the intelligence of the people to see the delay in putting those provisions before the House. He would not resume his seat without saying that he joined in the complaint that had been made by several Irish Members that the late Government and the present Government had drawn on the Irish Church Surplus Fund as the means of meeting the prevailing distress in Ireland. When the Vote of £750,000 was passed on the Relief Bill of last year, everyone in Europe and America thought it represented a generous contribution from Her Majesty's Government, that it was the wealthy people of England and Scotland, and the Exchequer of the Empire, that handed out that large sum; and he remembered reading some foreign newspapers which applauded the English Government for their magnificent generosity. But what were the facts? The fact was, that the magnanimous Government had put their hands into the pockets of the Irish Fund; and then posed before Europe and America as models of Christian benevolence. He mentioned that, to show that if he had been disposed to embarrass the Government in the slightest degree he, as well as other Members, had sufficient cause for complaint. Like his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork, he was disposed to place a great deal of reliance on the statesmanship of the Irish Chief Secretary. What was he to think of the machinery behind the right hon. Gentleman? What was he to think of the officials in Dublin? When the right hon. Gentleman came down and gave evasive answers—[“Oh!”]—he did not mean that the right hon. Gentleman could give any other, seeing the position in which the officials in Dublin had placed him—his conclusion must be that this Departmental Committee was absolutely doing nothing, and that the Canadian grants never could be realized unless pressure was employed by the Government. If the action of the Departmental Committee was to be imitated by other officials in Ireland charged with carrying out other provisions, he said they had better put the Bill out of the House of Commons at once. However, he was disposed to assent to the Motion that they formally went into Committee on the Bill, on the understanding that they were not to consider the clauses now.

MR. VILLIERS-STUART: Sir, no one acquainted with the present condition of Ireland doubts that a large addition to the grant for relief of distress is necessary; but the question is, out of what fund that grant shall come, and through what agencies it can be most efficiently distributed? There is a universal consent among all classes of Irishmen that it ought not to come out of the Church Surplus, because that is a fund raised from the entire land of Ireland—the property, therefore, of the entire country, and it ought, therefore, to be applied only to such purposes as the whole country can participate equally in. But it will not be so applied, if it is applied to the relief of distress, because that is partial—limited mainly to the West of Ireland and certain scheduled districts. Of course, if there were no alternative, we should prefer even the sacrifice of this National Fund rather than that our fellow-countrymen should be left in a state of destitution. But there are other alternatives. The hon. Member for Salford, in his maiden speech the other day, came forth like an infant Hercules of debate, strangling those serpents—the landlords—with both hands while yet in his Parliamentary cradle. And he was loudly cheered by hon. Members opposite; but they would not have cheered quite so loudly if they had known a little more of his views, for he is one of those bigoted political economists, who would oppose most vehemently any grant to Ireland from Imperial resources. He showed the cloven hoof in the course of his speech; for what was the first accusation he brought against the late Government? Why, that they had not met the distress through the ordinary operation of the Poor Laws. Had he been better acquainted with the present state of things in Ireland, he would have known that the burden could not have been thrown upon the ratepayers, because they themselves are so impoverished that even existing arrears of poor-rates cannot be got in without resorting to the odious expedient of distraining what little property is yet left to them, and reducing the ratepayers themselves to pauperism. The poor-rates, then, are not an available resource. But there is another fund to which Ireland contributes her full share, and on which she, therefore, has a claim. I believe I am below the mark when I say that fully one-tenth part of the Imperial Revenue is derived from Ireland. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) has pointed out that it would be an inconvenient precedent if, in every difficulty, the Imperial Exchequer were resorted to; but the present crisis is exceptional—it cannot be met out of the usual resources. If Ireland had the management of her own finances, could it be supposed for a moment that she would have sanctioned the expenditure of millions on foreign wars while her own people at home were in dire destitution and distress? The Imperial Government undertakes to manage her finances for us, and they are bound so to manage them that we shall have no reasonable ground for complaint; but we are entitled to complain if our contributions to the Imperial Exchequer have been lavished upon wars of aggression by the million, while not a shilling of it has been devoted to the relief of distress at home. Is not that the fact? Hitherto the distress has been met either from the donations of private charity in England and Ireland, or Australia and Canada, or the United States, and lastly, out of that purely Irish fund—the Church Surplus; but out of the Imperial Exchequer not one shilling has as yet come. We do not ask for assistance from the Imperial Exchequer as a charity, but as a right.

Mr. Villiers-Stuart

I hope the Government will re-consider their decision. No step they can take will give greater satisfaction in Ireland, or be hailed as a surer earnest of their anxiety to meet the just claims of Ireland. The sum so granted will not be lost—every farthing of it will be ultimately repaid. The Government of Lord Beaconsfield has been repeatedly referred to as the late Government; but I would rather call them the too-late Government, for too late they were in the matter of Irish distress. Most earnest representations had been made to them from every quarter—from Poor Law Guardians, from magistrates, from the clergy of both denominations, and from landlords—but to no purpose. Twenty-five Boards of Guardians in all parts of Ireland had agreed to send their chairmen to wait as a deputation upon his Excellency to represent the state of things, and to suggest measures which their experience in dealing with poverty and want suggested as most efficient; and no body of men were better qualified to make suggestions on this subject. But what reply did they receive? Why, that no good purpose would be served by their attendance, for that the Government were already well aware of the state of things. What conclusion are we to draw from this reply? Are we to conclude that his Excellency was callously indifferent to the distress? We know that was not the case; for, in their private capacities, both he and his noble-hearted consort have exerted themselves most zealously to stem the distress. The fact is, his Excellency had made all the representations in his power at headquarters in London, but in vain. At last, they brought forward a measure in the shape of loans to landlords to enable them to give employment. That was a step in the right direction, but it did not go far enough. Concurrently with loans to landlords, loans should have been made to Boards of Guardians, and through them to tenants for the permanent improvement of their holdings, so as to diffuse the relief as much as possible, and bring it home, as it were, to every man's door, and reach every remote corner in which want and destitution, from want of employment, existed. It is not in the power of the landlords to do everything. I must remonstrate with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) for making, indiscriminately against the landlords, charges unsupported by evidence; I deny that landlords have used these loans as a lever to exact arrears of rent from their tenants. If any landlord has done such a thing, he would deserve to be shown up; but no such case has been proved. They are, in the matter of these loans, merely acting as paymasters, and the distressed labourers get the benefit of it. I myself have taken out one of these loans, and am reclaiming a tract of mountain land with it, which, when reclaimed, will be worth, perhaps, 10*s.* per acre per annum; but as it costs about £18 or £20 per acre to reclaim, the return will only be 2½ per cent—whereas I shall have to pay £3 8*s.* per annum to the Government for the next 35 years; therefore, I shall be out of pocket about 1 per cent per annum on the loan for the rest of my life. I would be quite willing to make over part of my loan to the Board of Guardians if they will act as paymasters instead of me. I think it would be a good thing to empower landlords to give up a portion of their loans to Boards of Guardians, for they would constitute a very suitable machinery for the distribution of relief funds in employment, and I suspect that many a landlord would be glad to avail himself of such a provision. I will move that the following clauses be added to the Bill—[“Order, order!”]—if I am out of Order, I shall submit them in Committee. Meanwhile, I hope that the Government will be disposed to make important Amendments in the Bill, both as to the fund out of which the relief is to come and as to the agencies and machinery through which it is to be distributed.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, there could be no doubt that the distress in Ireland was very urgent and pressing, but the present Bill did not meet it in any adequate or direct manner. He did not believe that any body of men on the face of the earth, except the Members of the late Government, would think of relieving Irish distress by the circuitous process of giving grants to Irish landlords. They had various bodies administering relief in Ireland; large amounts had been sent to them from London and from abroad, and it was remarkable that in these cases no suggestion had been made as to applying the money to relief through the landlords. They had the Dublin Mansion House Committee, and not one member of that body had ever suggested such an extraordinary system of relieving Irish distress. In like manner they had the Land League and the Fund got up in connection with the New York Herald, both composed of practical and sensible men, and none of them had proposed to alleviate the existing suffering by passing money through the pockets of the Irish landlords. He had listened with great pain to the discussion which had taken place on this subject in the House. What did they find? They found that they were pleading for relief for a people who would not be in need of relief if only justice were accorded to them—for relief to an industrious people who inhabited a fertile country. Why was it that these debates on Irish relief should occupy from time to time the attention of the House of Commons? It was perfectly plain that something interfered with the prosperity of the Irish people—that there was some check and bar to that prosperity; and he found that check and bar in the system of government which the British House imposed upon the Irish people. The true Relief Committee for Ireland would be an Irish Parliament. At the present time there could be no doubt that the condition of the country was one of great suffering, and he feared that that suffering might be accompanied with serious disturbances. The Irish Members were heartily tired of all these discussions. They asked that they should be allowed to apply the resources and revenue of their own country to its necessities and requirements; and so long as they were prevented doing so, the House would have these debates again and again—humiliating debates such as had occurred in connection with the present question. The Bill now before the House would not, unless it were modified and improved in important respects, meet the crisis which now existed; and he hoped it was not too late for Her Majesty's Government to take into consideration whether some better means than it proposed could not be devised. Let the Government consider, for example, whether it would not be better to lend this money not to the landlords, but to the relief of committees which were now keeping the people alive.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, the Bill had been actually described as a sham. It was quite incorrect to call it a measure for the relief of distress in Ireland, for it was perfectly inadequate for the purpose for which it appeared to be intended; but he hoped the measure would be sufficiently changed and amended to make it what it pretended to be.

MR. LEAMY said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland was perfectly right, the previous evening, in discarding the weak arguments of the Attorney General for Ireland in favour of the Bill. The Chief Secretary gave as his reason and argument for the measure that the late Government had sanctioned a grant of £500,000 which they had no authority to do; because of that sanction Irish landlords had undertaken works, or had incurred expense preliminary to the prosecution of works; and, in order that these landlords should not be damnified, the present Administration felt compelled to introduce this measure in order to fulfil the promises which their Predecessors made. While he regretted, and regretted extremely, that the late Government should have found no other means of relieving distress than by making advances to the landlords, who had become the hereditary enemies of the Irish tenantry, and to whose intolerance and harsh treatment it was mainly due that the tenants went down at the first shock of the distress, yet he still recognized the force of the obligation which the Chief Secretary asked the House to allow him to fulfil. They had seen the plan proposed by the Government tested, and they had seen that it was a failure. They had seen that, notwithstanding the fact that £250,000 had been issued to the landlords, over 500,000 of the Irish people had been kept from starvation—not by the circulation of the money consequent on the employment given by the landlords, but by the generous hand of foreign charity. If this country did not extend immediate and timely assistance to the Irish people, it was inevitable that the present distress must deepen into famine before the harvest. He had been told that the Chief Secretary was watching the distress. He would tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he waited until the funds of the charity organizations were exhausted, he would wait until a terrible famine had come upon the people before he was aware of it. The Bill was wholly useless for the purpose for which it was intended; and it could not be wondered at that they had some misgivings as to placing in the hollow of one man's hand the lives of 500,000 of their fellow-countrymen. It had been conceded that this Bill could not meet the existing distress. The Chief Secretary had admitted as much. The obligation on the Government was merely to fulfil the obligations which had been entered into by the former Administration. The present Government had a right to do so; but he could not see why, in order to maintain that honourable obligation, the Chief Secretary and the present Administration should dip their hands into the pockets of the Irish people.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was now conceded by the Government that the Bill was not expected or intended to alleviate in any way the distress at present prevalent in Ireland. It was only a Bill to indemnify the late Administration; and, seeing that that was the case, he would suggest to the present Government that they would curtail as much as possible the amount of money to be given to landlords under the engagements of the late Ministry.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the House had kindly listened to him for some time on Thursday evening on this subject, and he should not trouble it long on the present occasion. He quite admitted that if the Irish Members wished for more time to put on the Paper their Amendments to the Bill, that time must be given to them. But he was afraid that the delay would result in endangering the objects which he had in view in pressing forward the measure. The first object had relation to the guarantee for railways, which was a matter deserving very close and careful consideration. His object in introducing the railway clause was two-fold—to endeavour to facilitate the development of some of the most distressed districts where the tenants experienced great difficulty in selling their produce, owing to the want of railway accommodation; and to provide some additional work for the next two or three months. He was afraid, however, that if the Bill were not allowed to go into Committee and passed without delay, its provisions would not be of much use for the purposes of employment before the harvest. He should very much regret that that should be so; but he was very greatly relieved by finding that hon. Members who came from the distressed districts, and who ought to know the wishes of the people, did not seem to regard that as a matter of any great importance. With regard to the Fishery grant, he had no fault to find with the general tone of the remarks which had been made; but he might give a very strong contradiction—he was going to say a very strong denial—to the statement that he had made evasive replies as to the fishery piers, or as to anything else which had come under his cognizance since he had been in Office. He had endeavoured to say exactly what he thought, and to give to the House all the information in his power. There was no danger whatever in reference to these piers on account of the proceedings of the Departmental Committee. Their object was that the moment the Bill passed they might know exactly what piers the Treasury would give grants to, so that the final meetings might be called and the final notices issued. If they were obliged to postpone the Bill, there might be some danger as to whether the Canadian grant would be made use of or not; but he trusted that the dispensers of that Fund, recognizing the difficulties of the situation, would not allow any such delay to prevent them giving their money towards the relief of the distress. He hoped the Representatives from Ireland itself would not take offence when he said that, while he was determined to do everything he could for the advantage of the Irish people, he did not believe he should be rendering them any really true help if he were to press upon the Treasury or the Imperial Government to give them very large sums of money. What he wanted to see was the resources of Ireland developed by loans which were properly given, and which had the security that all loans ought to have; and if time were given for maturing such a system, he did not think that grants would ultimately be necessary. It would be positively fatal to be pouring out showers of gold from the Imperial Exchequer. Besides, hon. Gentlemen must remember that Ireland was not the only country in which there had been distress. There had been distress both in England and Scotland, and at the present moment there was a larger proportion of English than of Irish paupers. He hoped Mr. Speaker might now be allowed to leave the Chair, and he would promise to bring the measure forward again as soon as the Government could give him time, though he was aware that they had a great deal of other Business. With regard to the £750,000, he stated yesterday, and he now repeated, that they did not know that all of it would be wanted; but they did know that no larger sum than that would be wanted. The Government considered that they were strictly fulfilling, not merely the pledges of the late Government, but the pledges of the late House; and if they did not fulfil those pledges, they would adopt the unprecedented course of one Parliament refusing to abide by the obligations entered into by a previous Parliament.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman were very serious. He should like to know what were the obligations entered into by the late Parliament, when they were entered into, and with whom? The obligations of the late Parliament were on the Statute Book, and were contained in Clause 17. And the Act of the present Parliament was now brought in because of the violation of those obligations, because the Government had violated—illegally violated—the obligations which were placed on the Statute Book by the late Parliament. It was hard for Irish Members to know what to do. He listened to the debate yesterday, and he heard Irish Members accused of the high crime and misdemeanour of allowing the Bill to pass last Session. The fact was, that although they knew the Bill of last Session was an unreality, and would not work, they had the menace before them that if they resisted it they would be made to appear as if they were resisting a benevolent intention for the relief of distress in Ireland. With that menace before them, some of them did violence to their consciences—they allowed the Bill to pass; because, if they had taken any other course, the Press of England and Ministers would say—"We wanted to relieve Irish distress, and the Irish Members of Parliament prevented us from doing so." In the face of those circumstances, having the convictions that experience had justified this, they recorded their warning against the measure; but even that small remonstrance was denounced as obstruction to the benevolent intentions of the Government. And were they to be taunted today by some Gentleman who appeared here for the first time, and who got his knowledge of the subject from the miserable scraps of reports that he found in the London morning papers—were they to be taunted with the fact that they allowed the Bill of last Session to pass? There were English Members who were animated by a sincere desire to help the Government in the belief that this Bill was to do something good for Ireland. He warned those hon. Gentlemen that their belief was doomed to dis-illusion. The Chief Secretary had told them that they did not rely on this Bill to relieve the distress.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, interposing, said, what he said was that he could rely on no Bill without out-door relief to meet the distress till the harvest. He had also stated, and gave figures in proof, that a large amount of employment had been given in consequence of the loans, and that consequently without the loans the distress would have been greater.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he quite understood the right hon. Gentleman, and he still understood him to say that he relied rather on the power of giving out-door relief than on anything this Bill would accomplish. He put it to the right hon. Gentleman, if the Bill was not to grapple with the distress in June, July, and August, what was the Bill to do? Where would there be any guarantee given that the landlord, having secured the loan upon easy terms, would not take his own time for going about the work?—that he would not wait till next December or next year? If money at 1 per cent was to go to the landlords for the purpose of relieving Irish distress, where was the clause providing that the loan should be cancelled unless the work was commenced within a certain time? The right hon. Gentleman told them that £240,000 had been "issued;" but do not let them run away with the idea that that was for the relief of Ireland. How much of that £240,000 had been issued but not spent? Why, it was absolutely offering the people circumlocution instead of relief. In Committee he would ask the Government to put in a clause providing that unless the landlords availed themselves of the funds within the proper time, the loan should be recalled and cancelled. If that was not done, the Bill would be a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. The Prime Minister complained of the Public Business being stopped by these discussions. That was true, but it was not the fault of the Irish Members; and he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the way to facilitate the passing of the Bill, relieve the House, and insure the Bill being made efficacious, was to refer it to a Select Committee consisting entirely of Irish Representatives, with the Chief Secretary as Chairman. The Committee could go upstairs, and not interfere with English Business in the House. There was no Minister of the Crown whom they would more cheerfully elect as Chairman. He offered the right hon. Gentleman that suggestion in order to put an end to these discussions, which were animated by no disposition to thwart good intentions, but because they held that the Bill would turn out a gross mistake.

MR. GIBSON said, the discussion had proceeded on the assumption that the 17th section of the Act of last Session was the governing section, whereas the 9th section was that which governed the Bill. In that section the terms of the two Treasury Circulars were distinctly set forth. The loans which had been referred to were equally applicable to sanitary authorities as to landlords; and it must not be forgotten that the Treasury Circulars incorporated in the Bill gave no power to entertain applications made after the 29th of February. The present Government were now simply giving effect to and ratifying the Circular of the 29th February last.

MR. PARNELL thought that the Circulars gave power for additional loans to be obtained.

MR. GIBSON said, that the original amount of the loans had been increased to £750,000, after considerable discussion in that House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, in order to bring to a practical issue the point in dispute between the Chief Secretary and the Irish Members, he would propose the following Amendment:—

"That the Committee stage of the Bill in the Whole House be dispensed with, and that the

Mr. A. M. Sullivan

Bill be referred to a Committee consisting of the Members who prepared and brought in the Bill, and of the Members for counties, cities, and boroughs in Ireland."

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member desires to take the course indicated by this Amendment, he ought to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. The constitution of the Committee would form a subject for subsequent consideration by the House.

MR. PARNELL said, the course proposed by the hon. Member was one which was proposed in the late Parliament by the then Leader of the House in reference to an English Bill. There was also a precedent for it in a proposal made by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, who was well acquainted with the Forms of the House, and who was a Constitutional lawyer. In the last Parliament that hon. Member placed on the Paper a Notice for referring the Officers and Courts (Ireland) Bill to such a Committee. The Speaker, also, in his examination before the Select Committee on Public Business, gave it as his opinion that it was undoubtedly competent for the House to dispense with the Committee stage of a Bill in the Whole House. It was only by the courtesy of the House that he could discuss the merits of the Motion; but it seemed to him that it had been promoted by the apparent desire of the Chief Secretary to put on the shoulders of the Irish Members the blame for the postponement of the Bill. The course suggested would obviate all inconvenience, and would expedite the passage of the Bill.

MR. RYLANDS, as an English Member, felt that he was in a difficulty with respect to the Bill considering the view he had taken of the measure of the last Session. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member could only speak to the point of Order. At the same time, he thought that the proposal of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was an entire departure from the practice of the House. He did not think it was competent on a Motion for going into Committee to move that an Amendment of such a character could be moved. The proposal to dispense with the Committee stage was of such a novel character that, without the special instruction of the House, he could not put the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS said, the House was, no doubt, willing to pass measures which were necessary to be passed in the interests of Ireland; but he must point out to the Government that if all the time of the House was to be occupied in discussing Irish questions, there would be no hope of getting through some English measures which were before the House, and which were of great importance. The question was, was the Bill necessary in the interests of Ireland? ["No, no!"] Then, if it was not, it ought not to occupy the time which it had done in that House. Contrary to expectation, a debate had arisen which seemed capable of being prolonged indefinitely. He appealed to the Government to have some regard for English Members. He was prepared to support the Government, if the Chief Secretary told the House that the Bill was absolutely necessary; but he must protest against the waste of time which was taking place without making any progress on any Business at all.

MR. DAWSON said, the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down made it incumbent on them to vindicate themselves in the face of the country and the House from a very serious and grave imputation. Irish Members had been charged with being guilty of delaying and obstructing a measure for relieving the Irish people. Did he need to remind them how last Session, rather than appear obstructive, they gave the measure their adhesion and allowed it to pass; and what had been the result of that measure? He would call them back to the real question before them. He saw the Prime Minister the other night hanging on the lips of a Member of that House when he spoke of the miseries from which the English people were suffering, and, after he had dwelt on the imagined wrongs which would be done to English workmen if certain things were not done, he saw the Prime Minister go to that hon. Member and compliment him on the way he had spoken. But did hon. Gentlemen in that House listen with wrapt attention when the wrongs and grievances under which the Irish people suffered were spoken of? A sum of £750,000 had been granted by the Bill; but how much of that sum had reached the pockets of the starving people? The Chief Secretary had cast on the Irish Members the responsibility of delaying the Bill; but he could assure the House that the Irish Members were anxious to prevent the misery and mistakes of last Session, and they were anxious to bring real help to the suffering people of Ireland. He would not hesitate to grant the people relief from the Irish Church Fund; but the fact was, that he was afraid of that fund. It was a dangerous fund for a Government to have always at hand; because, if they always had a fund like that at hand, they would not take the precautionary measures they ought to take to prevent the recurrence of such evils. It had been forgotten how many millions had been spent in the Famine of 1847, and how fruitless that expenditure was. It had done no permanent good, and it saved no lives. With regard to the fishery proposals, they would probably be good for Ireland prospectively, and as far as trade and industry went; but they would not meet the present distress and feed the starving people. The construction of the piers would require skilled labour; it would employ divers, skilled stone-dressers, and other such labour, but it would not give the people of Ireland the relief which they required. It might be called a Land Improvement Bill — a Railway Extension Bill, to take effect some years hence; but a prompt Relief Bill it was not. There was no clause in the Bill to stand between the people and destruction. They had to provide for the four months which still intervened between the present time and the harvest. Would that Bill provide for that four months? If not, it was a futile measure. The Bill was called the Relief of Irish Distress Bill; but he asked if it appeared in one clause from beginning to end, that it effected that purpose?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill.

MR. DAWSON said, the cure was worse than the disease. He apologized to hon. Gentlemen for intruding the affairs of Ireland so much upon the House; but they were ready to relieve the House of Irish affairs at any moment. The question was whether the Bill was intended to relieve distress, and whether it would do so in the next four months; because if it would not do that, it would not carry out the object for which it was ostensibly intended. It was hard to pretend to give the people of Ireland a great boon when, in reality, it was nothing of the sort.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was extremely anxious to bring this long discussion to a close, and not to have any more time wasted by the debate. He rose for the purpose of moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He understood that this was the proper stage at which to make that Motion; and it was his intention, if the Motion were carried, to propose that the Select Committee be composed of the Irish Members of that House and the Gentlemen who had brought in the Bill. He did not know how he or his Friends could answer better the appeal made to them by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). He was the more desirous to respond to that appeal, because all the Irish Members knew that every measure for the promotion of the good of Ireland had his hon. Friend's sympathy and support. It was impossible for Irish Members wishing to see this made a beneficent measure to allow it to pass in its present condition. It was equally impossible that a Committee of that House should discuss with advantage all the clauses of the Bill and dispose of the Amendments the Irish Members proposed to introduce. The time of the House would be lost in spoiling and marring the measure. What he proposed was that the Irish Members should be allowed to take the Bill upstairs, and there endeavour to make it a genuine and useful measure, without occupying the time and attention of the House in general, or laying themselves open to the objection made by the hon. Member for Burnley. The defective local machinery in Ireland prevented Irish Members from sanctioning the Bill as it stood. If they had proper local machinery in Ireland the Bill might be worked; but there was none which they could trust for carrying out a measure like that. That fact made it necessary to endeavour to shape the Bill so that it might be of some practical use even with the defective local machinery in Ireland, and that could only be done by means of a Select Committee composed of those who best understood this practical question. He begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee,"—
(Mr. Justin M'Carthy,)

—instead thereof.

An hon. MEMBER said that the Irish Members did not wish to impede the Bill, so far as they considered it useful, but to add materially to its use by the Amendments they intended to propose.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have heard with some surprise the proposal which has been submitted to the House within the last half-hour. I really thought by this time that some consideration would have been shown for the mode in which the Business of the House is to be conducted. Shortly after 2 o'clock an explanation took place in the House between the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) and myself. I stated that we had understood, and that the Irish Members had understood, it to be agreed that, on the one side, you, Sir, should leave the Chair, and on the other side the Government—for the hon. Member spoke on the part of his Friends around him—expressed their willingness not to press the clauses of the Bill to-day, but would postpone the Bill until some future day. I need not go into further detail. The hon. Member for Cork said the statement and the proposal made by the Government was perfectly satisfactory to him. My reference was not to himself individually, but to him as speaking on the part of his Friends, and my statement was so entirely satisfactory that he at once accepted my suggestion and withdrew the Motion he had made for the adjournment of the debate. When I recollected how this week had been spent I was extremely glad that such a course had been agreed upon between us; but now I find that nearly three hours have been spent in a debate on the Bill after the hon. Gentleman had accepted my proposal, and now at the close of these three hours a proposition is made openly on an entirely new subject—namely, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. Nor is that all, for, at the same time, indications are given of the ulterior steps connected with the reference to the Select Committee. It is not to be referred to a Select Committee in the ordinary sense—that is to say, to a limited number of Gentlemen who are to go through the clauses of the Bill, but to a Select Committee, to be composed, with the exception of two or three Gentlemen whose names may be on the Bill, of the 105 Gentlemen who claim to represent the interests of Ireland in this House. That is not a Select Committee in the usual and well understood meaning of the term in this House. What is understood to be the object of this Select Committee? If I comprehend the hon. Gentlemen's purpose, it is that in lieu of charging this relief upon the Church Surplus in prosecution of the determination of the last Parliament, it is to be charged upon an Imperial fund. But why it is to be charged on an Imperial fund is a question which interests the rest of the United Kingdom—England and Scotland—who are to be represented on that Committee by the two or three Gentlemen who have obstructed the Bill in the face of 105 Irish Members. Both on account of the nature of the vista thus opened to us, and my sense of duty in the matter, as well as the necessity I feel of securing some regularity in the transaction of Public Business, I must certainly decline to accede to such a Motion.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to complain of a breach of understanding, which he had described as having been entered into at the commencement of the day's proceedings. He correctly stated that, upon his undertaking that the clause of the Bill should not be proceeded with in Committee, he (Mr. Parnell) expressed his perfect satisfaction. The right hon. Gentleman had also said he (Mr. Parnell) expressed his willingness to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate. But the right hon. Gentleman treated him rather unfairly when he intimated to the House that the debate which ensued on the Motion for going into Committee was brought on by him (Mr. Parnell), or that it had been controlled by him. When he spoke, the right hon. Gentleman assumed that he was representing the views of those hon. Members who sat behind him. It should be borne in mind that the debate which ultimately ensued on the Bill was continued by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, with whom he had, personally, no influence whatever. It was not until the Chief Secretary made a statement that he considered it necessary that some action should be taken. What was the statement of the Chief Secretary? The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that the result of carrying out the arrangement made between the Prime Minister and himself (Mr. Parnell) would be to put off the further stages of the Bill until a very late period of the Session, and that the people of Ireland would be deprived of the benefit of the Bill; and, amongst other things, they would be deprived of the grant for fishery piers, and that, consequently, the fishing industry on the North-West and West coasts of Ireland would be materially injured, and the starving population suffer during the ensuing season. What was this statement of the Chief Secretary but quibbling? He must, therefore, throw the blame of the subsequent discussion on the Chief Secretary. Why should they tacitly accept the blame which was due to the right hon. Gentleman? It was to point out some practical way to making progress that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) rose and moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Irish Members, which would naturally save the time of the House, and enable them to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. That discussion had arisen because the Chief Secretary had cavilled at the arrangement which had been made, entered into two hours ago. It was not likely that the Irish Members would sit under the imputation which the Chief Secretary had thrown on them; they therefore threw back on him the odium of breaking the arrangement and impeding the progress of the measure.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would reply to the statement of the hon. Member as temperately as he could. The hon. Member said the remarks he had made were "cavilling," and he cast on him the "odium" of the course which had been taken; he must inform the House what really had happened. The hon. Member had made a not unreasonable appeal that more time should be given for Amendments, and said no harm would arise from postponing the consideration of the Bill in Committee. His right hon. Friend, admitting the appeal for more time to consider further Amendments, stated that, considering the other Business before Parliament, it would be impossible, if the Committee were not disposed of to-day, or some substantial progress made, to take up the Bill again for some time. But he said his regret at that cause was diminished by the statement of the hon. Member, whose knowledge of Ireland must be great, and speaking, as no doubt he did, for those who acted with him. But when the debate went on, it became necessary for him to reply to several statements which were made, especially by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). Perhaps it would have been better that he had not replied to the allusions made to himself; but he did not think it would be quite respectful if he had not done so. He stood up just to confirm what his right hon. Friend had said—that was all he did. He did not think it deserved the imputation of "cavilling," or that any "odium" should be cast on him in consequence. With regard to the proposal for submitting the Bill to a large Irish Committee, it would obviously be unwise and unfair to English and Scotch Members, and it was scarcely fair to attempt to start such a suggestion suddenly upon the House.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY was quite prepared to admit that the question whether the relief should come from Imperial funds or the Irish Church Surplus should be left to be determined by the House; but as regarded other parts of the Bill he thought there should be but one opinion. The Bill was a measure to continue an Act which had admittedly failed for its purpose. Therefore, it was asked that it should be referred to the 103 Members, who, knowing the actual circumstances of the country which the measure concerned, were best able to consider its provisions. Such a Committee was desirable, because the great majority of English and Scotch Members backed up the Government when the present Act was passed, on the lines of which this Bill proceeded. That Act had ended in failure, and he anticipated the same result from this Bill unless it were referred to a Select Committee as proposed.

COLONEL BARNE thought the proposal made would facilitate the progress of the Bill, and also of the general Business of the House ; and it must be remembered that when the Bill came back from the Committee, the House could, on the third reading, reject any of the conclusions of the Committee.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—[BILL 188.]
(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Fawcett, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he would endeavour to make a clear statement of its objects; and he would endeavour to distinguish between the objects that were vital to the Bill and those that were improvements of the law and useful for the development of our Savings' Bank system. The Bill had four distinct objects, the first of which was the most important. It was to provide for the extinction of the large deficiency upon the funds available for meeting the demands of the Trustee Savings' Banks. This deficiency, in truth, was a concealed portion of the National Debt of which the House took no cognizance in the course of its ordinary proceedings, and it was never brought before it as a portion of the national obligation. A very important and wise step was taken by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer for providing that the House should be called upon from year to year to vote a sum of money represented by the interest upon this deficiency. The measure was not only sound in principle, but it had the effect of calling the attention of the House to the existence of the deficiency itself. Acting in the spirit of that proceeding, he now proposed to make provision for the extinction of the deficiency itself. That deficiency amounted, as he reckoned it, to the sum of £3,565,000. That, however, was a larger amount than the sum which stood as exhibiting the deficiency in the account taken last November, when a statement of the assets and liabilities of the National Debt Commissioners in account with the Savings Banks Trustees was presented to Parliament. The reason was that the annual account was naturally and reasonably based upon the price of the public securities on the day when the account was taken. His object now was to present the matter to the House from a different point of view, and to provide a common measure for the values of different years, in order that the House might be inclined to trace and to follow the growth or diminution of this deficiency. For this reason it was necessary to fix upon a valuation of the funds. He had taken as the valuation that which represented the interest at 3½ per cent as the well-understood average at which the public could borrow, taking one year with another, which mode of computation, 92 and some shillings, was the mode of computation for the value of the Consols laid down by the Commissioners, the other stocks and securities following Consols. It was upon that basis, which enabled them to compare one year with another, that the deficiency stood at something over £3,500,000. The mode in which he proposed to provide for it was by constituting Annuities which would pay it off in the course of about 25 years. He was sanguine enough to anticipate little or no difference of opinion on the propriety of getting rid of this deficiency. The wound had been stanchd to a certain degree already, and now it ought to be completely healed. The next proposal, which was also a vital portion of the Bill, was the proposal to reduce the rate of interest now payable to the Trustees of the Savings Banks from £3 5s. to £3 per cent. The principal ground on which he made this proposal was that they could not afford to pay £3 5s. He believed his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was of a different opinion on this point; but he (Mr. Gladstone) thought he should be able to demonstrate that he was correct. There was no doubt that at times, and in certain forms, they could borrow at less than 3½, or even at less than 3; but, on the other hand, at times the public had to borrow at a higher rate. In 1855 money was borrowed at £3 12s. 6d., or 3½. The loan was made up partly of £100 Consols and partly of Annuities, and the 3 per cent was represented by the annual interest of the Consols. It was quite true that on a certain occasion they could not borrow under $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; but he thought the late Chancellor of the Exchequer a good deal relied upon that rate of interest as the rate they found it expedient to give on the part of the State to the National Debt Commissioners. Was it not a fair inference to draw, that if, for the interests of the State, and to purchase Annuities, they borrowed of the National Debt Commissioners at the rate of £3 15s. per cent, it would be reasonable that £3 should be paid to the Trustees of the Savings Banks? As he was responsible for these £3 15s. Annuities, he wished to explain the thoroughly exceptional character of the transaction, which unfortunately had been lost sight of. These Annuities were first created in the year 1860, which was a period when the financial position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was totally different from what it was now. He had then to deal only with the old Trustee Savings Banks. They found him money to invest in prosperous years, when he did not want it, and they drew largely upon him in years that were not prosperous when he did want it. Money was required for fortifications, and it was provided by Parliament by Annuities; but now it would only be necessary to go to the National Debt Commissioners and obtain Annuities at a rate nearly corresponding with the rate shown by the price of the public Stocks. In this case they were bound to have some regard to the terms on which they could have sold these Annuities in the open market. They could not have sold them except upon unfavourable terms, and they were bound to proceed in the manner he had described. The National Debt Commissioners were obliged to sell Stock to meet the funds to be borrowed on the Annuities. It would not be a fair arrangement, in that state of things, when they were bound to sell Stock at the time, if they did not give a rate of interest as liberal as that they accepted. That rate of interest was wholly out of the question in the present state of things, when the National Debt Commissioners were not dependent upon any risk in the sale of Stock. He had asked himself a question still more radically illustrative and decisive of the whole matter—namely, whether the public could show themselves, from the accounts of the National Debt Commissioners, able to afford to pay a rate of interest amounting to £3 5s. He would demonstrate to the House that they could not afford to do it. An opinion had somewhat widely prevailed that the existing deficiency in the assets of the National Debt Commissioners as compared with their liabilities to the Trustees of the old Savings Banks was a deficiency created before 1844. But he thought it was demonstrated by figures that this was not the case, a considerable deficiency having been created since the date mentioned. The deficiency in November, 1844, was £1,633,000; and in order to bring the question to the test of figures he should wipe out the deficiency then existing. The mode in which he did this was by setting aside in the account that sum of £1,633,000 and allowing it to accumulate at a uniform rate of interest—namely, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—till next November. That sum credited with compound interest would have risen to a sum of £5,004,000. For the purpose of his computation that was the amount which he had to put down to the credit of the fund. To the debit he had to put down all that they had given to the fund since 1844 and the present deficiency. A comparison of those two sums showed what had been the loss since 1844. The actual deficit on November 28th, 1879, was £3,565,000; but in 1863 he proposed to Parliament as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Parliament agreed with him, to make a present to the Savings Bank Funds of £1,644,000, which, of course, went to diminish the then existing deficiency, and must now be reckoned in determining the question under consideration. The mode in which that was done was this—£25,000,000 of Stock standing in the name of the Commissioners were cancelled, and a book debt was created against the country of £25,000,000 simple, which, as compared with the value of Stocks at the time, represented a gift to the assets of the National Debt Commissioners of £1,864,000. But there was a further process. In 1867 the Government reconverted this sum into Annuities, and the effect of that and of giving the interest upon the £24,000,000 as of cash instead of Stock was to add a further value of £974,000 to the gift conferred upon the Commissioners. There was another small item of £236,000 to be taken into consideration; and, adding those sums together, he found that there stood at the debit of the account £6,621,000. The debit of the account, therefore, stood charged with this sum. The value of the 1844 deficiency accumulated at compound interest would have been £5,004,000, and it followed that there had been a deficit accruing since 1844 of £1,617,000. That was a strict and rigid demonstration, based on the principle of uniform valuation, of the fact that by paying £3 5s. per cent through the National Debt Commissioners in respect of the funds of the Trustees of the Savings Banks, a loss had been entailed of £1,617,000. The House was now in possession of the imperative reasons why the rate of interest should be reduced. Though no man liked to see the rate of interest paid to him reduced, he had not found that there was any general disposition to complain of his measure. He had heard it argued that the public should pay more than the market rate in Savings Banks, and many people said that the public ought to pay as much as they could afford to pay. But he had shown what the public could not afford to pay; and even if that were otherwise he would still be of opinion that that was not the right principle to proceed upon. The right principle was that a rate of interest should be paid sufficient to attract a depositor. The old Savings Banks had done a great deal of good in their time, and were entitled to their respect and gratitude; yet now the State had hit upon and largely developed another system, greatly preferred by the public, and which was, certainly, far preferable, there was no reason why two classes should not receive considerable equality of treatment. The main objection to the old system as compared with the new was summed up in this: Under that system the State gave to the depositor an imperfect security, and yet failed to convey to his mind the knowledge that that was the case. He believed that not 1 in 10 of the depositors in the old Savings Banks knew that his security was imperfect. Since 1844 this singular state of things had existed—that while there had been an absolute security for what was due from the State to the Trustees, the obligations of the Trustees to the depositors had only been secured by their personal honour. He could not help thinking that this was a serious disadvantage to the system. There was another consideration which he wished to bring before the House—namely, that these Trustee Savings Banks were not purely public establishments. Besides holding as assets the sums to which they were entitled from time to time at the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, and besides holding real property which had gradually come into their hands, they had a most important function—one that might at any time greatly change their position relatively to the State. They were permitted by law to make investments in other than the public securities on behalf of depositors who desired them to do so. They were entitled, by obtaining the assent of their depositors, to call upon the State for the liquidation of any amount of claims, and to invest in other securities in a manner virtually independent of State control. He could not but feel that these circumstances gave great additional force to the other and broader considerations which he had alleged—namely, that the sum of 3½ per cent was greater than in a long series of years the State could afford to pay. As to the old Savings Banks, it was quite fair to say that their management was quite as good as that of the Post Office Savings Banks. But the state of things as between the Post Office Savings Banks and the old Savings Banks was this:—In the case of the old Savings Banks the State paid £3 5s., and the trustees paid, according to the latest computation, to their depositors £2 18s. 4d., showing a difference of 6s. 8d. In the Post Office Savings Banks the State gave to the depositors £2 10s., the expenses were reckoned at 11s. 1d. per £100, making a total of £3 1s. 1d. It would be observed that the difference in the cost of management was considerable; but he was bound to say that the case might be stated in a manner somewhat more favourable to Post Office Banks. There were other considerations of great interest in the comparison of these banks. The old banks held £44,192,000; but the Post Office Savings Banks had, during the 17 or 18 years of their existence, accumulated no less than £32,012,000—a very satisfactory result. Nor had there ever been any serious loss or difficulty of any kind experienced in carrying the system out. The old banks, on the whole, exhibited a small increase in the amount of their deposits with the National Debt Commissioners. From 1861, when the Post Office Banks were founded, the average annual increment in the old banks had been £133,000, and in the Post Office Banks £1,769,000. In fact, fourteen-fifteenths of the new investments made by the public had been in the Post Office Banks. The greatest disadvantage which the State had to encounter in connection with the old banks was the largeness of the variation of the annual movement; and there was a great contrast, in that respect, between them and the Post Office Banks. In the year 1866, the old Savings Banks withdrew from State control, over and above what they deposited, no less than £2,369,000. On the other hand, in 1874, they deposited, over and above what they withdrew, a sum of £991,000, making a maximum range of variation of no less than £3,370,000. But the income of the Post Office Savings Banks had been perfectly regular, though not, of course, uniform. The maximum amount of Post Office deposits was £2,293,000 in 1872, and the minimum £1,533,000 in 1865. There was a perfect liberty of transfer given to the public between the two classes of Savings Banks, and consequently by comparing the sums transferred means existed of testing the public favour for the two systems. The sums transferred from Post Office Banks to Trustee Banks since the foundation of the former amounted to £120,000; but the sums transferred to the former from the latter reached a total of £3,560,000. He was anxious that it should be understood that he would never think of the old banks otherwise than as very valuable institutions, and that he would regret extremely anything which would give a shock to their system. He did not think that his proposals would produce any such shock. The change which he proposed was required by the equity of the case, the figures which he had quoted with regard to the course of events since 1844 demonstrating that 3½ per cent was too large a rate of interest. It might be retorted that the Government lent money to local bodies at a higher rate than this. Well, he was bound to say that he was unwilling to recognize that method of lending to local bodies which had crept in of late years as a permanent portion of our system.

Mr. Gladstone

He objected to the mixing of perfect security with imperfect security, and could only look upon the system of lending to which he was referring as temporary. It was, therefore, with great satisfaction that he had found on the part of some large and public-spirited municipalities a disposition no longer to go, cap in hand, to the State for the purpose of borrowing money, but to go into the market on their own security, and there raise what they might want for their local purposes. He had now enumerated the main and vital objects of the Bill; but in addition to these there were two others which he would mention. He proposed to enlarge the sum which might be deposited in Savings Banks, without any distinction between the older Trustee Banks and the Post Office Savings Banks. He hoped to raise the limit of total deposits from £200 to £300, and the limit of the sum which might be deposited in one year from £30 to £100. There was an objection to this on the ground that it was competition with private banking enterprise. He admitted that banking enterprise was of value to the country, and ought not to be subjected to undue competition; but he would not enter upon this subject in detail at the present time. The boast of the postal system was that it carried to every man's door the accommodation which it offered. If we had in this country a banking system so largely developed that it went into every considerable parish, he should be very doubtful indeed about raising the limit from £200 to £300. The parish in which he lived had a population of more than 8,000 persons; but they had no bank there. The parishes in this country were about 10,000 in number. The Post Office Banks in the three countries were already about 6,000 in number, and were rising at the rate of 300 banks a year. But the other banks, including branches, hardly reached 2,000, and were accumulated in a comparatively limited number of parishes. This, however, was a question to be considered in Committee, and he should freely leave it to the unbiased judgment of the House. There was a fourth object of the Bill which he must briefly mention; but he did not think it was likely to raise any great difference of opinion. Power was given under the Bill to trustees to invest on behalf of depositors in Government securities. That was a purpose which, so far as he could learn, was approved on all hands. Nobody objected to the Savings Banks being made the medium of communication between depositors and public securities, there being at the present moment hardly any means of convenient investment for the public in the country at large. He anticipated that the public economy which would be effected by the measure would be very considerable, not less, he thought, than £100,000 a-year, and perhaps somewhat more, contingent, however, to some extent, upon the issue of a question which had been raised that interest ought to be allowed by the State upon the separate surplus fund. He did not wish to preclude an unbiased consideration of that question; but, on the other hand, it was quite clear that they ought to introduce into the minute system of banking represented by these Savings Banks the principles represented by their legislation with regard to the public funds, under which from time to time unclaimed sums were written off, without prejudice, of course, to the absolute validity of any claim which might be revived. With these observations he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. W. FOWLER, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"That the extension of the limits of deposits in Savings Banks proposed in this Bill would result in so serious a discouragement of private enterprise that, in the opinion of this House, so such step should be taken without careful inquiry," said, he was sorry to be obliged to oppose that measure, much of which had his entire approval; but if Clause 3 was retained he should feel it his duty to divide the House. The Prime Minister suggested that that point might be discussed in Committee; but such a clause formed an important part of the Bill, and ought, therefore, in his (Mr. W. Fowler's) opinion, to be discussed on the second reading. He considered that the proposed extension of the limits of deposits in Savings Banks involved a new competition by the Government with banking enterprise. The Bill practically established a new form of trading by the Government. The Post Office Savings Banks were to receive the savings of persons of small means, as artisans and others, and were, to a great extent, an eleemosynary institution, established by the Government in order to encourage thrift among the poorer classes of the community. They were not banks in the proper sense of the word. They were not conducted, as an ordinary business would be, for the sake of profit, but for the good of the people. They had been very successful; but they had entailed very great expense on the country, and they were now practically asked by that very Bill to pay a large sum of money for what they had lost in conferring this boon on the people. They were practically asked to start a Government Bank under the form of a Savings Bank. To prove how important the proposed competition with other banks might be, he would draw attention to a few figures from the Report of the Committee on Banks of Issue that was appointed in 1875. It appeared that in the National and Provincial Bank of England there were, in the year 1874, 122,760 depositors. Of these, 83,723 were depositors of sums under £100; 16,780 of sums ranging between £100 and £200; and 7,430 of sums between £200 and £300. The total sums of the deposits of these three classes respectively were £3,603,289, £2,518,310, and £1,865,844. Thus 87 per cent of the whole number of depositors had deposits under £300, the new limit proposed by the Bill; and nearly 35 per cent of the total amount of the whole of the deposits were under the same figure. In the Scotch banks, 88 per cent of the depositors, numbering in all 417,657, were under £300, and 35 per cent of the total amount deposited—£76,243,000—were under £300. Again, in the Munster Bank, out of 22,116 depositors, 15,761 were under £100, and 5,043 between £100 and £300. These figures proved absolutely the serious character of the measure before the House. He objected to it entirely, and for several reasons. In the first place, he objected to the trading by Government as a whole. He did not see why the Government should oppose private traders, and bring the capital of the whole nation in competition with the comparatively small means of private people. He said, in all seriousness, he saw no difference between this proposal and that of starting a Co-operative Store in Bethnal Green by a Government staff. It was just as important that the people should have their food cheap and good as that they should have their savings taken care of. Again, he said that the proposed competition was an unfair one. Other banks were compelled to keep reserves of various kinds; but there was no suggestion here for the maintenance of any proper banking reserve. All the deposits must be at once invested in Stock, and that was really the reserve proposed. But it was not a proper reserve for a bank, if it was the sole reserve. He had known the time in his own knowledge when they could not sell £100,000 Consols for money; and they had heard from the Prime Minister that there had been times when he had had to find a large sum in cash on balance for the Trustees Savings Bank. He had told them that as to the Post Office Banks, so far, they had always received more than they had paid; but that would not be always so. He maintained that the proposal, as a banking proposal, was thoroughly unsound. Moreover, the Government keeping no reserve would thus compete with banks, and involve them in a new danger. They had enough to do to provide for the natural risks of business; but now they were asked to provide for a new risk, created by Act of Parliament, and which no foresight could have led them to anticipate. Another objection he made was that the rate of interest allowed was too high as a matter of business. Of course, if it was an act of charity, it was another matter. At the present moment the Bank rate of discount was $2\frac{1}{2}$, the very rate now allowed at the Post Office Banks; and, so far as one could see, it seemed likely that they might have a long period of low interest. The Bill was in another way very dangerous. It was well known that banks collected money in one part of a district and lent it in another, or collected it in one part of the country and lent it elsewhere; but if this Bill should pass, many large sums would be diverted from commerce and agriculture, and would be sent up to a Government office, where they would be used in raising the price of Consols, which was already high enough. He thought, again, that there was a great danger to Government in holding large sums on demand, and all the more if they consisted of the deposits, not of artisans, but of small traders, eager to make the most of their money. They would have money on deposit in prosperous times, when Consols were high; they would draw out in order to buy Stock when the funds were low in price. So the Government must buy high and sell low, and thus must lose heavily, and all the more the more the proposed scheme succeeded. He wished also to remark that the change was not necessary, for in the Bill itself was another proposal which met the need of any who might want to put by any larger sum in safety. It was proposed, and wisely as he thought, that facilities should be given for putting small sums of money into Consols. In that way the Government would not hold great sums on demand; but Stock would be held by investors at their own risk, and without danger to the Government. In France they had a limit of deposit, and all sums beyond the limit pass automatically into Government rentes. He did not know that they should like that here; but it would, he thought, be better than this proposal. He had only to say, further, as to the investment clauses of the Bill, that he should go further, and he should allow a man to buy even £1 in Consols. And he wished to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to Sub-section 6 of Clause 4, by which, as he (Mr. W. Fowler) understood it, a man might sell £500 Stock, which he had previously invested, and put it into the Savings Bank, in addition to £300 already there; so that he might have £800 on deposit. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] He believed he was right in his reading of the clause, and he asked attention to it. On the whole, he objected so entirely to the 3rd clause of the Bill that he should take the sense of the House on the second reading of the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the extension of the limits of deposits in Savings Banks proposed in this Bill would result in so serious a discouragement of private enterprise that, in the opinion of this House, no such step should be taken without careful inquiry,"—(Mr. William Fowler,)

—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the Bill, in his opinion, contained several valuable provisions. Some portions, however, were open to great objection. There was, however, much force in the arguments of his hon. Friend who had just spoken; and he was glad to understand that the Government did not regard the 3rd clause as a vital part of the Bill. No less than from 30 to 40 per cent of the deposits in the Scotch and country banks consisted of sums below the limit allowed by the Bill; and it was difficult to anticipate what effect on the public would follow the withdrawal from those banks of so great an amount of business. He did not think it clear that Clause 3 would benefit the Government, while it would, of course, certainly interfere with private enterprise. The tendency would be that money would be paid in when the rates were low and Consols were high; and would be drawn out again when money was high and Consols low. At present, with the existing limits, the temptation to do this was much less. One important portion of the advantage which banks afforded to a country was by advances of money, thus assisting trade and manufactures. But the tendency of this Bill would be to withdraw money from local banks, and thus compel them in turn to call in loans, and to restrict the facilities they offered to their customers. In Scotland and Ireland this would be felt with especial severity, and surely so important a step ought not to be taken without careful inquiry. The proposed change was not to encourage thrift, but to enable Government to do banking business for the sake of profit. That would quite alter the character of the Savings Banks. Moreover, the large amount of money that this proposal would place at the command of the Government would constitute a danger, unless larger cash reserves were held than was now customary. It was the custom now to speak of the Floating Debt of the country at £26,000,000; but in addition to this sum, for which the country was liable at short notice, there was the sum of nearly £100,000,000 sterling on account of the Savings Banks and Post Office Savings Banks deposits. No great difficulty had occurred hitherto; but it seemed to him that the danger would be greatly increased by the Bill, and that was a point which deserved serious consideration. Again, he regretted the proposal to lower the rate of interest in Savings Banks. The time might come when this would have to be done; but he thought the time had not yet arrived. A great deal had been said about the loss of £4,000,000. But he would point out that in spite of this deficiency it did not follow that the Government had made a loss. The deficiency was not due to the present moderate rate of interest, but to exceptionally high rates paid in old days, and to financial operations made for State purposes, quite irrespective of the interests or requirements of Savings Banks. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government (Mr. Gladstone) said, in 1861, that—

“The money deposited with Government by Savings Banks has enabled successive Administrations to effect an economy in the management of public money transcending ten times over the charge the State has been put to.”

He did not see that a clear case had been made out for a reduction of interest. The Government proposed to make good the deficiency of £4,000,000. On this the interest would be £120,000 a-year. But the deficiency was now only £72,600. The Government could therefore continue the present interest, and yet have a surplus of £50,000 a-year. If they diminished the interest their profit would be £150,000 at least. The object of the proposal was not to avoid a loss, but to make a profit. It was often said—“Why should the Government allow 3½ per cent to the old Savings Banks, and only 2½ per cent to the Post Office Banks?” But it must be remembered that in the one case the 3½ per cent was allowed to the bank, in the other to the depositors. The old Savings Banks had to pay the expense of working the business. Three-quarters per cent was a moderate estimate, and this would make the two rates exactly equal. In fact, it appeared from the Parliamentary Paper No. 179, just issued, that, in addition to the £743,000 allowed for interest, the Post Office Banks cost the Government £198,000 for expenses, which were between ½ and ¾ per cent more; so that, in fact, the Post Office Banks cost the Government as near as possible 3½ per cent, just as did the old Savings Banks. In these circumstances, he trusted that the Government would not use their great majority to force a measure which was regarded by many as unwise and even unjust, at any rate without full and careful inquiry.

MR. HARCOURT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Harcourt.)

MR. GLADSTONE hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not persevere in his Motion, as the discussion had turned upon matters relating to details of the Bill. If the House chose to discuss these details on an adjournment, well and good; but he did not think there had been any intimation of such a desire. A most reasonable request had been made to him to have the figures brought out upon which he computed the loss since 1844. That probably would take some days, but he would see that the Papers upon the subject were laid upon the Table. If the Bill were read a second time he would not fix the Committee until a fortnight hence, which would give an opportunity for the production of the figures required.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he approved of a great part of the Bill, though he disputed the Prime Minister's estimate of the loss on the old Savings Banks, and thought it rather hard that persons who had invested in them should have this fine inflicted upon them when it was not necessary for the purposes of the State. Had it not been for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he did not consider the 3rd clause as the vital part of the Bill, he should have joined the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) in opposing it. To that clause he was wholly opposed. On the assumption that the point could be argued in Committee, he would support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MAGNIAC asserted that there were principles involved in the details of the Bill which demanded attention, and which could not be discussed in Committee. He hoped it would not be attempted to carry the clauses of the Bill in a hurry.

MR. BARING said, he was willing to consent to the second reading on the understanding that it was not to be understood as implying his agreement with two of the vital principles of the Bill.

Sir John Lubbock

MR. HARCOURT expressed his willingness to withdraw his Motion. ["No."]

MR. SPEAKER said, that the time for deciding it had passed.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the Clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LICENCES).

RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Mr. Speaker: I beg to move, as an Amendment—

"That, inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of Licensing the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of Licences should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected, namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system, by some efficient measure of local option."

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have not been able to bring forward this Amendment as a substantive Motion, so that there would have been no need of my opposing the House going into Committee. I have been compelled to bring it forward now because I secured my place in the ballot for Friday, and were I not to bring it forward now I might not obtain any other day during the Session. I am also sorry that on account of the Morning Sitting having been held, there will not be so much time for hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in this matter to express their views as I could have wished. It is, perhaps, on this account more incumbent on me, as so many of my hon. Friends will be precluded on account of want of time from addressing the House, to endeavour to make my case as clear as I can, so that there can be no misunderstanding in the House as to what I mean by the Motion I have now the honour to propose. I suppose, Sir, that very seldom it falls to the lot of a Member of Parliament to move the same Resolution in the House of Commons twice within the space of three months; but it happens that now, although moving the same Resolution, I am moving it in a fresh Assembly. As we all know, a new House of Commons has been elected. Of course, there are many old Members here who must have heard me over and over again on this subject, and who will retire to the adjoining rooms and simply come in when the division is called. I will endeavour to address myself more especially to the new Members, who will not have heard the subject thoroughly discussed, and who will, no doubt, wish to know what is meant by Local Option. Well, I think I may say that whatever may be thought in this House of the question with which I am dealing and of the policy I am about to advocate—I think it may be said that the late General Election and the result of that Election prove that there is, at any rate, a very general interest felt in this measure throughout the constituencies of the Kingdom. One of the results of that interest is that some of my old and valuable opponents are not here to-night to oppose me as they used to do. I miss the familiar face of my old and respected enemy, Mr. Wheelhouse, and I have some doubt in my mind as to who will take his place. I am not at all certain who will; but I have been told that before the night is over it will be found that the mantle of Mr. Wheelhouse has fallen upon the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). Well, we have got a new House of Commons, and we have got a new Government, for which some of us are glad and some of us are sorry; but, at any rate, I am happy to remember that the Prime Minister of this new Government stated some months ago, when writing on political subjects, that amongst the questions which the new Liberal Government, or any new Government, had to deal with, the question of altering and amending the Liquor Laws would hold a foremost place. That right hon. Gentleman, in the long list of the meaasures with which he said Parliament would have to deal, put a measure for amending the Licensing Laws about fifth. Well, Sir, of course the problem is, how we are to deal satisfactorily, as far as the law is concerned, with this very great and pressing evil. I do not think I need waste, or, at all events, occupy the time of this House by going into details concerning the extent and magnitude of this evil; but if I let it go as a matter of course, then someone will get up and say that the evil is not so great as I suppose it to be, and that I am not justified in attacking it. I will, therefore, with the permission of the House, quote only two authorities, which I think deserve weight in this House. Now, the first authority I will quote is the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. And I quote the words which were used by him at a place where he was not likely to indulge in exaggeration. I refer to words which he used at a great festival of Licensed Victuallers down at Exeter. He said—

“The evils of drunkenness become more and more patent every day. If we examine into the matter, we are more and more impressed with the frightful evils which arise.”

And then he said—and I believe very truly—

“The conscience of the country is fully aroused upon this subject.”

Now, that is the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition. Now, what did the Prime Minister say two or three months later in this House? In the last speech which I heard him make in this House before Parliament dissolved, he said—

“It was stated just now that greater is the calamity and curse inflicted upon mankind by intemperance than by the three great curses—war, pestilence, and famine.”—[3 Hansard, ccli. 475.]

I think, Sir, I need not go further; but I will say that if legislation is able in any way to deal with such a state of things, producing more evils than war, pestilence, and famine, then that legislation is the most important subject which could occupy the time of the British House of Commons. Now, I am not going to-night to advocate a new Licensing Law. I think I may assume—I think I am justified in assuming—that Parliament up to the present has done its best to make the

Licensing Law satisfactory. The Government which came into Office in 1868 dealt with the Liquor Laws. We all remember Mr. Bruce's Bill of 1872, which made these laws a little better. We all remember the late Home Secretary's Bill in 1874, which made these laws a little worse. Both political Parties up to that time had tried what they could do to amend the Liquor Laws, which stand now in pretty much the same position as they stood when Mr. Bruce's Bill was passed. I think everyone will agree with me that this trade about which I am talking is very different from any other trade. It is only a very short time ago that a statement appeared in the newspapers to the effect that during the last year £14,000,000 less than in the previous year had been spent in intoxicating drinks. This liquor trade was £14,000,000 poorer than usual, and everybody rejoiced. There was not a good man in the country, or a man who took any interest in the welfare of his fellow-men, who did not say—"This is capital news, £14,000,000 less paid to the drink trade." But is there any other trade people would say that about? No, Sir, no other trade in the country, excepting, perhaps, an undertaker's. Every other business rejoiced in being able to tell the world that they had done a large amount of business—that they were extending their boundaries and enlarging their trade; but this liquor trade is on quite another footing. I remember that when my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) made some very interesting inquiries at Birmingham, and detailed them to the Lords' Committee on Intemperance—the first inquiry related to the number of people who went into public-houses during certain hours—the publicans seemed very angry. They said—"Why are all these things raked up against us?" But surely a butcher or a baker would have been delighted if such were done in his case, because it would be well advertised that so many people came into his establishment. Well, now, there can be no doubt that the trade is bad, and that those who engage in it have an uneasy feeling themselves, that instead of benefiting the community they are injuring it. I see in the papers sometimes remarks to the effect that I was the person who invented the idea that the liquor trade was a bad trade. I assure the House it is nothing of the kind. People who are not fanatics or enthusiasts, but sober, sensible men, have described what this trade is long before I came on the scene. Let me read a passage from The Edinburgh Review, which is not enthusiastic about anything. Now, The Edinburgh Review stated 25 years ago that—

"The liquor traffic, and particularly the retail branch of it, is a public nuisance, physically, economically, and morally."

I have never said anything stronger than that. Then there was Mr. Charles Buxton, himself a brewer, and a Member of this House, in an article upon drunkenness, said:—

"The struggle of the Church, the library, and the school against the public-house and beer-shop is but one development of the war between heaven and hell."

I would not for anything in the world have used such language, and I only quote it to show what other people say of the trade. I do not come here to attack the traders. I do not attack the Licensed Victuallers. If you license a man to a trade, of course it is only in human nature that he will do as much trade as he can; and you would set yourselves an impossible task if you were to say, "thus far you shall go, but no further." It is only natural that the Licensed Victuallers will do what they can to make money and push trade; and I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright). I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman when he said the other day, addressing some Licensed Victuallers at Birmingham, he was much hurt to hear the strong language which temperance advocates used about the Licensed Victuallers. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that nothing does so much harm to temperance as the use of strong language against the publicans. They are only doing their duty; they are licensed by law to carry on the trade, and we who license them and maintain the law by which they are licensed are really responsible for the crime and misery and degradation which the trade produces. Well, Sir, that is my opinion of the trade. Now, I want the House to bear with me while I explain how it gets into operation. The law admits that it is such a dangerous trade that it is not to be carried on freely and openly by anyone who likes, so it has prohibited the trade throughout the country but to a very few people. The law allows a few picked men—a few discreet persons, a few privileged men—to say to their friends and neighbours, or to those in whom they take an interest—"You may have a licence; you may have the exceptional privilege of selling drink;" and these persons are what are called the Licensing Magistrates. So I say your law is prohibitive with the exception of a few privileged people. It is said—"Oh, no, the law is free; free trade with restrictions." I am quite willing to take that answer; but if that is so, I say make the restrictions perfect, and carry them out. Well, it is supposed that these discreet persons—these magistrates—know exactly what is wanted by their neighbours in regard to drink. It is supposed that if there is a very poor place, full of pauperism and misery, they are wise enough to know whether the setting up of beershops in that neighbourhood would improve the wealth and happiness of the locality. They are supposed to know, if they see a populous district free from crime, whether it is not desirable to establish drinkshops to cause a continuance of that prosperity and happiness. It is said they must know better than anybody else what their friends and neighbours all round them want. Why, we had a very able defence of the magistrates only the other day from the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Montague Scott). I am sorry the House was not very full when the hon. Gentleman made his speech. He said he had spent all his life in licensing public-houses, and he said magistrates were all like himself. They were men of moral and religious views, who had brought up their children well, and the logic and conclusion was that they must know the wants of the neighbourhood. That may be so. It is a very beautiful theory. This licensing system reminds me very much of what Voltaire said—"It is a beautiful theory, never refuted, except by facts." And what are the facts? These discreet persons have licensed such a number of houses in the country that last year we had £128,000,000 spent in this country in intoxicating drinks. I think that any

hon. Gentleman will agree with me that it would be a great blessing and a great mercy if we could greatly reduce the expenditure of the people upon these drinks. I do not think I am wrong in saying this; because there is not a Judge, there is not a clergyman, a Poor Law Guardian, there is not a gaoler who does not tell you that this drink is the cause—the main cause—of the crime and misery of the people. Only a very short time ago, my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), who opposes this measure, because, as he says, he must have a glass of beer when he takes a walk out, said he had no hesitation in saying that—

"Both in Ireland and in the back slums of Glasgow—"

And, he might have added, within a few hundred yards of this House—

"We could find scenes of misery produced by that drink, out of which we raise revenue, quite as humiliating as any we could find in China produced by opium."

And I am quite sure that my right hon. Friend speaks the truth when he says that. Proofs of the evils are innumerable. Bills are repeatedly brought into this House dealing with the question, and the curious thing is that they are all in my direction. They are all meant to restrict the trade and to diminish it more or less. They are good or bad in comparison to the length they go with me, and they are brought in for all kinds of motives and by all kinds of people. I said all kinds of motives. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridge-shire (Mr. Rodwell) brought in a Bill that had a little suspicion of the Permissive Bill; but he went down to a brewers' dinner at Cambridge, and they did not care for his Bill because they thought there was a little bit of "Lawson" in it. But the hon. and learned Gentleman assured them that he did not intend by his Bill to shut up public-houses, but to shut up the Member for Carlisle. Now, the House will perceive, from what I have said, that I do not propose a large and comprehensive measure effecting the reform of the licensing system. I do nothing of the kind. I leave that to clever fellows and to statesmen, neither of which I am. All I propose is that the people for whom these places are licensed—the inhabitants for whose benefit they are set up—shall be allowed to say whether they will have them or not. I state in the words of my Resolution, "that it should be optional," that those who want public-houses should be allowed to have them, or if they did not want them that they should not have them; that they should be allowed to choose whether the magistrates, with whom I find no fault, should be allowed to use their discretion and exercise their power in those districts in which persons live who are interested in the matter, and do not desire to have them. That explains the meaning of the word "optional." "Local" means that there should be a certain district marked out in which the inhabitants should be allowed to exercise their option. Surely there can be no harm in confining the choice to given localities, because the system already is localized. I do not want, as some people say, to allow small communities to legislate for themselves; but I want this House by legislation to say under what conditions the licensing authority shall exercise their power, and I want it to say they shall not exercise that power where the people do not wish the power to be exercised. Let me explain a little further by quoting my friends the Licensed Victuallers, who recently sent out a Circular which is not quite correct. In that Circular they call upon hon. Members to oppose my Motion, because it takes

"From the only law-making body in the nation—namely, Parliament—its rightful Constitutional functions."

I have explained that it takes away no function whatever from Parliament; but I simply ask Parliament to exercise its undoubted function, and say under what condition magistrates shall exercise their power. Then they go on to say this measure of mine tends to degrade the magistracy—

"By depriving them of a power which for more than three centuries they have exercised, in the main, wisely and well—"

And then say that the Resolution substitutes for them

"Bodies of persons swayed by popular passions and prejudice."

I suppose everybody is more or less swayed by popular passions and prejudice, magistrates included. But I do not propose any new licensing body; I only want the opinion of the people to be given to this licensing body. And then they affirm that I wish to confer

"Upon such bodies despotic powers to deal with vested interests of legal creation, and give effect to all sorts of crotchets and crazes in disregard of individual liberty and social convenience."

That is the publican's case, and a very poor one. I must now explain, as well as I can, what is the meaning of this Resolution, this Local Option Resolution. Local Option seems to puzzle a great many people. ["Hear, hear!"] Some one says, "Hear, hear!" I will explain it for his benefit, and I will tell him from whom I, at any rate, learnt the words Local Option. I first learnt it from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, because some years ago he wrote a letter to some person who wrote to him on this matter, and he said his disposition was to let in Local Option as far as was practicable and could be safely done. I need not read the Resolution again; I think hon. Gentlemen have it in their hands and know exactly what it says. It does not emanate from my own brain. I could not have invented anything so good. It came from Convocation. Convocation is a very important body, and upon the subject of drunkenness it had presented to it a very valuable Report. In that Report you find a recommendation which I have embodied in the Resolution before the House. I copied it word for word, with the exception of the few words at the end, "by some efficient measure of local option," which I inserted in order to make the matter a little clearer. And more than that, after Convocation had reported and used this recommendation, it was endorsed in a Memorial signed by no less than 14,000 clergymen of the Church of England, and presented to the Archbishop and Bishops. I mention this so that no one can suppose I may bring forward anything at all revolutionary or reckless. The Resolution means what I have already described, and these rev. gentlemen who brought in this Report stated that the Resolution meant this—that parishes or districts should be allowed to place themselves in the same condition in which other parishes are already placed by the will of the landlord. They said—

"We have found out by inquiry that when good and benevolent landlords have exercised the power they possess, and said—'We will not have drink shops in our neighbourhood,' a state of sobriety has arisen, and people had been most thankful to them for protecting them from the evil of drink."

And they say that if their Resolution was adopted by the House of Commons, other districts and parishes would have a chance of obtaining the same benefits as these districts have. Of course, those who vote for my Resolution will vote that it is wrong for an irresponsible authority to force drink shops on an unwilling neighbourhood; and those who vote against it will vote that an irresponsible authority ought to have the power of running counter to the wishes of their friends and neighbours, and of the inhabitants of the district in which they live. That is the whole meaning of the vote we shall take to-night. Some people prefer the word "control." Well, I do not see much difference between the two words. If you are able to control a horse you are able to stop him altogether. If you cannot stop him he is not under control. My object is to give people the power of stopping an evil altogether where they wish to do so. I think that if licensing is really intended for the benefit of the people, it is only logical that the wishes of the people should be consulted. Now, I think that Her Majesty's Government ought to give me some little help in this matter, because they are very strong on local self-government, and I am very glad to see they are. I read only yesterday a most interesting despatch to our Ambassador at Constantinople about Turkish reforms; and in that despatch I read that—

"The only desire of Her Majesty's Government is that a new law shall be so drawn up as to render equal justice to all classes of the community, with as large a measure of self-government as the conditions of the Provinces will admit."

Are Albanians and Bosnians, and Roumelians and Bulgarians, to be fit for self-government, and are the Government going to refuse self-government to the people of this country? Surely they are as fit for self-government as the Albanians and Bulgarians. It is of no use appealing to my hon. Friends on the other side of the House. Gentlemen on that side of the House know far better than I do what is the best policy for them, and they have decided upon taking their stand upon beer. ["No, no!"] But I ask my Friends of the Liberal Party how they can possibly object to the policy and the principle embodied in this Resolution? I say nothing of the details; but I ask how they can possibly object to the principle embodied in the Resolution? What do the whole of us do when we go stumping the country electioneering? We declare that the wicked Tories will not allow the county franchise to be reduced, but that we excellent Liberals can trust our fellow-countrymen, and are prepared to bring the county franchise down to the level of that in the boroughs. We are unanimous on that point. There are only two of us who have been against it. One has been converted, and he has been sent to the House of Lords; the other is still unconverted, and he has been sent to Constantinople. Then I want to know with what face—I can use no other expression—with what face we Liberals are to go up and down the country, declaring that inhabitants of counties are entitled to a choice between two candidates, when we cannot trust them in a matter of this kind, to say whether or not they will have a public-house next door to them, involving the morality and happiness of their children and all that is dear to them, and concerning the prosperity and happiness of the districts in which they live? I should be astonished to hear any man who calls himself a Liberal get up in this House and say that he is in favour of reducing the county franchise, and yet that he cannot trust these men he is going to enfranchise to look after a matter such as the licensing of a beerhouse. I do not believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) would do that. I know that many of my hon. Friends look with suspicion upon the Resolution, and say that it is the Permissive Bill in disguise. ["Hear, hear!"] I knew that somebody would cheer that. But I want to ask those Gentlemen who cheer how it is possible in human nature, or, at any rate, in Parliamentary nature, that a Resolution can be a Bill? It is a thing impossible. I used to bring in a Permissive Bill, as the House is aware. I annoyed hon. Members over and over again with it. Hon. Members did not approve of the details. I have come to the conclusion that if you want an argument for opposing a thing you do not quite understand, the proper course is to say you do not approve of the details. Under these circumstances, I said—"Let us have the principle in regard to this question, and let us leave all the details over." I can show my hon. Friends how this cannot be their old friend, the Permissive Bill. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) has often openly and fair and above board, in his usual straightforward manner, written letters strongly condemning the Permissive Bill itself; but he always said at the same time that he thoroughly approved of the principle of the Permissive Bill. Well, then, I say—"Do not condemn the Resolution. Do not give it up because there are no details." I do not wish to make any secret about it. I will not deceive the House; I believe that the Resolution does contain the principle of what I used to call the Permissive Bill, and that is, that the licensing of public-houses should only be permitted in places where the inhabitants of the districts desire the existence of licensed houses in their midst for the sale of intoxicating drinks. That has always been my policy and principle. That is why I propose this Resolution, because I wish—I must repeat it in order to make it clear—because I wish to lay down the principle that public-house licences ought not to be forced upon unwilling communities. That is enough for me, and it makes me like the Resolution. But some of my hon. Friends say that it means something more. If it does, I am exceedingly pleased; I am delighted. If it does, so much the better for the Resolution. Let anyone explain what it means in the best way he can, and I shall be most happy to hear his explanation, so long as he votes for it. I say, again, let there be no licensing where the people do not want it. That is my principle, and I leave the details over. That is why I propose a Resolution instead of a Bill. I want now to explain to the House that this principle of mine was really understood by the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance, and I do so because I quoted a sentence the last time I moved this Resolution in this House. I quoted it as endorsing the policy which I then advocated, and which I now advocate.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) who then led the Opposition, but who is now Secretary of State for India, seemed to think that that quotation did not do my cause much good, because he said the Lords' Committee had condemned the Permissive Bill. I will quote the paragraph again, for that is the reason why I quoted it. The Lords' Committee condemned the Permissive Bill. They condemned the Permissive Bill utterly; but they endorsed the principle of the Resolution also thoroughly; and because they condemned the old Permissive Bill, I think it makes the case all the stronger. It is an admirable sentence, pointing out the enormity of the evil, and the unsuccessful efforts which have hitherto been made to remove it; and that fact will, I think, justify me in reading the passage once more to this House. It says—

"When great communities, deeply sensible of the miseries caused by intemperance, witnesses of the crime and pauperism which directly spring from it; conscious of the contamination to which their younger citizens are exposed; watching with grave anxiety the growth of female intemperance on a scale so vast and at a rate of progression so rapid as to constitute a new reproach and danger, believing that not only the morality of their citizens but their commercial prosperity is dependent on the diminution of these evils; seeing also that all that general legislation has been hitherto able to effect has been some improvement in public order, while it has been powerless to produce any perceptible decrease of intemperance; it would seem somewhat hard when such communities are willing at their own cost and hazard to grapple with the difficulty, and undertake their own purification, that the Legislature should refuse to create for them the necessary machinery or to entrust them with the requisite powers."

I say there never was a stronger sentence written in favour of the policy which I am advocating to-night. I hope I have explained clearly that the Resolution is not the Permissive Bill. So far as the Gentlemen are concerned who will follow me in opposition to the Resolution, I would advise them to confine themselves pretty much to abuse of the old Permissive Bill. That is what they did on the last occasion, and it very satisfactorily relieved their own minds; it was also satisfactory to the brewers, it shows a good deal of ingenuity, it does no harm to the Resolution, and it is complimentary to me in showing how prudent I was to propose a Resolution instead of a Bill. I now come to the Amendments which have been placed upon the Paper, but which, owing to the Forms of the House, cannot be proposed. I have no particular objection to them. The first, which stands in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), tells the magistrates that they ought to do what they already ought to do. I do not very much object to it. Then comes the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease), whom I regret to say a domestic affliction has kept from the House. I will therefore not allude to his Amendment. There is one by my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone), which says—

Very good; I see no objection to that. If the House decides in favour of it let them have that licensing authority. I have no objection to any of these schemes. They cannot make things much worse than they are. All I say is do not let any of the proposed licensing bodies force drink shops on places which do not want them. I come last to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and as I do not quite understand it I will say nothing about it. There is another strong objection to the Resolution. Most Houses of Commons do not like an abstract Resolution. But I believe there are cases where an abstract Resolution is laudable. There are exceptions to all rules, and I can quote cases which have occurred on both sides of the House where some of the most important legislation of recent years has been based upon abstract Resolutions. I recollect the celebrated Resolution brought in by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devonshire (Sir Massey Lopes) upon Local Taxation. When the Conservative Government came into power subsequently they acted upon it. The present Prime Minister, some years ago, moved an abstract Resolution in this House condemning the Irish Church. When the opportunity offered, and the right hon. Gentleman had a majority at his back, he very properly carried out the policy inaugurated in that abstract Resolution. There is another case which is still more in point. Many hon. Members, who were Members of the old House of Commons, will have a respectful remembrance of a worthy friend of mine—the late lamented Professor Smyth. He took up the question of Sunday Closing in Ireland, and he proceeded in the first instance by way of Resolution. He carried his Resolution, and a year or two afterwards he brought in a Bill, and was enabled to carry that measure in this House; which has already worked such wonders in the way of benefiting Ireland. That case afforded another argument in favour of abstract Resolutions. Hon. Members tell me that there ought to be something about compensation in my Resolution. If I would only do that they could find it in their hearts to vote for me. Now, I do not want to condemn compensation; but it is not the question which is before the House. The question is, whether it is right to force these houses upon an unwilling neighbourhood? and if it cannot be done without compensation, let us have compensation. I am quite sure that if ever my Resolution is crystallized into an Act of Parliament, this House will never refuse a fair demand from any body of men. I was glad to see what the Prime Minister said upon the matter in his electioneering speeches. He said that the publicans had not been very good friends of his; but he would, nevertheless, treat them fairly. I am just as anxious as the Prime Minister to treat them fairly, and to let them have every penny of compensation they are entitled to. But what were we told in regard to the Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland? The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), who knows all about the publicans in Ireland, was continually speaking about them in this House, and he told us distinctly that if that Bill passed 16,000 publicans in Ireland would be ruined. We passed the Bill. Somebody proposed compensation, and the proposal was laughed out of the House. My right hon. Friends who sit on the front Opposition Bench ultimately agreed to the passing of that Bill for closing public-houses in Ireland on Sunday, and they never gave a penny of compensation to these men, although they were told they would be reduced to starvation. Then there was another Bill. I am not now arguing against compensation; but I am trying to prove that I was not called upon to put it in the Resolution. My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury brought in a Bill which did away with a great number of beerhouses in England. It did a great deal of good, and prevented old-established houses having licences that were below a certain rent. My hon. Friend the Member for Mayo brought forward a Bill during the tenure of power by the late Government which did away with a great number of beer-shops in Dublin; but not one penny of compensation did the House of Commons consent to give. I do not, then, see any reason at all, if these hon. Gentlemen could bring in Bills without proposing to give any compensation, why in moving my Resolution I was obliged to include compensation. I have only now, in conclusion, to say that there must be something in this demand that the people so persistently send up. This House knows, as well as I do, that it has sprung from the poor and from the working people of this country. There are hardly any rich men, hardly any great men, hardly any statesmen, who take an active part in the matter. The rich and influential have treated us with scorn. The Press, up the last year or two, has been generally against us; but lately things have all changed. In past times our cause found few advocates even in the pulpit; we had no great orators going about the country as in the days of the Anti-Corn Law League; we had no great subscriptions poured in to aid us in getting rid of this monopoly. The great interest principally affected, and which is so powerful in the country, steadily exerted itself against us. The hon. Member for Derby—not the Home Secretary, but the senior Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass)—told us that for every pound we put down they could put down £100; and so they could. We had all that to contend with; and yet these men know, as well as I know, that I am not overstating the case when I say that in the constituencies at large no subject at this moment excites so much interest as this. And how can we have got it in that position with all the obstacles which I have described? There is no way in which we could have got it into that position except this—that our cause was just, and our demand right and reasonable. Now, Sir, I know perfectly well that the Government have many intricate and troublous questions to deal with, and I am very sorry to force any further matters upon them; but I do say that this is one which they cannot very long delay dealing with. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), in some able writing upon this subject years ago, said that if nothing was done the very stones would cry out. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman exaggerated the necessity of the demand. But, as I have said, I do not wish to embarrass the Government. Far from it. They have enough on their hands at the present moment, and I want by this Motion to aid them in dealing with the question. I was glad to see that the Prime Minister, in several of his speeches, stated that this was a matter in which public opinion must be paramount. No Government can go before public opinion. Far be it from me to urge them to do so. Any Government that did so would not do itself any great credit. I do not even urge the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to vote for the Motion; but I do ask him most respectfully to leave it to the unbiassed opinion of this House to reflect the views of the country. I believe—nay, I am sure—that the House is not insensible of the value of the course I am advocating. I am sure hon. Members of this House are convinced there are sound reasons for this policy which I propose; and I am not without hope that the result of our decision to-night will be such that this House will lay the foundation of a great reform, the full accomplishment of which hereafter, will, I believe, entitle this House to a memorable and an honourable place in the annals of the Parliaments of England. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. HUGH MASON: I rise, Sir, to second the Motion. I am sure the opinion in the House and in the country is universal that something ought to be done to check the great evil of intemperance, which prevails so extensively among us, and I am equally sure that we only differ as to the means to be adopted to carry out our purpose. I feel that a great responsibility will rest upon this House—upon every Member of this House—if they do not propose any measure themselves to check this growing mischief, and yet decline to help those of us who do bring forward measures which we think will, in some degree, tend to promote public sobriety. I will not take up the time of the House by quoting statistics which, over and over again, have shown how extensively intemperance does prevail in the country. Blue Books have placed before us the facts of the case; their statistics have been read by every intelligent man in the country, and every thoughtful man who has read them must deplore the extent of the mischief these statistics have revealed. This sad vice of drunkenness is the source and the foundation of a great proportion, to say the least, of the misery, the pauperism, and the crime which we all have to lament, and which prevail to so large an extent in the country. I know there are some good men who have said that legislation will be inoperative to check this evil, and that we must be content to wait for the slow growth of habits of sobriety before we shall see any improvement in the state of the people as regards this vice. But we are forced to admit, at the same time, that the Acts which have been passed, giving to Scotland and Ireland the power of closing public-houses only on one day of the week, have accomplished a considerable amount of good; and if we can only have a similar measure for England and Wales—which I earnestly hope we shall have by-and-bye—the good effects will be still more apparent. We do not wish to introduce any new principle of legislation; but we do wish to extend a principle of legislation which has prevailed in this country for centuries; for, in regard to the buying and selling of intoxicants, it is a trade which has been governed by Acts of Parliament for hundreds of years. I think we may claim for those who have done so much for temperance organization and temperance reform that they are never backward in the discharge of their duty, by sending money and by giving their services for other useful purposes—for the promotion of education, for the opening of rational places of amusement for the people, and for other means which have an indirect tendency, at least, in assisting those who seek to put down this evil. We are told our proposal is an instance of class legislation. Now, if I thought this, I, for one, would not for a moment have anything to do with it. It is said that it is an endeavour to establish a law which will control the poor, but which, at the same time, will exempt the rich from its operation. Now, I think the phrase “class legislation,” as applied in this case, is a very loose one, and will not stand the test of examination. What is it we seek to do? We wish to take the power of forcing these licences on a district from the hands of a few magistrates, and we wish to put that power into the hands of the people at large. We dare trust the people with the exercise of this power. They beg to be trusted with this power, and to be free from a power over which they have no control. Is it not too late to tell us we dare not trust the people with the exercise of this power, when we have given them the power to elect all the Members of this House, to elect members of Municipal Councils, and we have intrusted them with duties and responsibilities of the highest and most important character? But, I ask, who are they that use strong words in reference to us, in accusing us of bringing forward a measure of class legislation? I must say their advocacy of the poor is, to me, surrounded with suspicion and misgiving. They talk of confiscation in reference to our measure; but I am quite sure that, if any principle of confiscation were involved, this House would never be a party to sanctioning it. I know that in past generations this House has passed a measure for granting a large sum to the slave holders, who held a kind of property which, certainly, was acknowledged by the laws of the country; but which, in my opinion, was never sanctioned by the laws of God. Parliament is always tender, and always has been, for the protection of class interests; and I, for one, never will be a party to closing these public-houses forcibly by law without rendering that amount of compensation which the circumstances would seem to justify. I am equally certain that a Parliament of the present day would never sanction such a measure. The evil we deplore is so great, is so mischievous, that if buying up for their full value all the licensed houses in the country would extinguish the enormous evil connected with the traffic in intoxicants, I should be ready to pay the enormous price which such a measure would require; and I am sure that, morally, commercially, politically, and socially, the gain of such a transaction would be beyond all price. We groan under financial burdens which the evils and follies of past generations have imposed upon us; but we sit down, almost without a murmuring word, under this great burden, the drink traffic in its various ramifications. We grumble at the present day because the Government seeks to impose the additional 1*d.* on the Income Tax to relieve the suffering farmer; yet we bear, and do little or nothing to remedy, this other and far greater evil. I know of many instances where adjoining property has been greatly depreciated by the opening of a tavern. I know, also, of many instances where working men and working women, who must live near the factory where they earn their daily bread, have been compelled to leave their cottage, where they have dwelt for years, and to live farther away from their work, in order to escape the annoyance and temptation to their sons and daughters and to themselves which are inherent in the public-house. Our object is, as I have said, to take away the power from the magistrates, and place it in the hands of another class of people; and I, for one, am greatly surprised that the publicans and beer-sellers object to our proposed change. The magistrates are not the consumers; it is the working classes who are the publicans' patrons and consumers, and it is to these we wish to give the power to control the issue of licences. I know of many public-houses where the accommodation is altogether insufficient for the business, and where the social and domestic arrangements are utterly unfit for life; and I know of cases where a canvas of magistrates for new licences has frequently taken place for the purpose of seeking for political votes. And I know of cases—for I have for 20 years taken an interest, as a magistrate, in the proceedings of our licensing, or Brewster Sessions—I know of cases where, the law having been defiantly broken by the publican, the licence has been taken away by the magistrates; and, on an appeal being made to the Quarter Sessions, the decision of the magistrates has been reversed, and at one Quarter Sessions there was a "whip" of the magistrates for that purpose, the owner of the public-house being a Peer of the Realm. I say, let us have working men for this tribunal, rather than such a licensing authority as that to which I have referred. But, perhaps, we need not be surprised when we know how magistrates are too frequently appointed—appointed for political purposes, or as a reward for political services, where special fitness for the duties they would be called upon to discharge has been disregarded. Even in these modern days we see instances of appointments such as I have described. In Manchester, for nearly 20 years we have had no increase whatever in the number of licensed public-houses, and yet, at the present day, there are there more than enough for the wants and necessities of the community. Within these two decades we know that the population of that place has enormously increased, and yet this multiplicity of licences was granted by a Bench of Magistrates. From whatever direction I look at our present licensing system, the more I feel it cannot go on, and that a vital change must be made in it. In the borough which I have the honour to represent (Ashton-under-Lyne) I can, in the course of a 10 minutes' walk, pass 20 houses licensed for the sale of drink, and yet all these licences have been granted by former Benches of Magistrates, supposed to have regard to the wants and necessities of the people. And for some years it has been the practice of the big brewers to buy up extensively these licensed houses, adding enormously to their own trade. In some instances I know where the value of such property has been increased fivefold. We talk of moral means, apart from legislation, for the accomplishment of the good end we seek—the putting down of drunkenness; but I have lived long enough to see that moral means are insufficient. As the excellent Bishop of Manchester said, we build churches and we found schools; but experience shows that the drunkenness of the country more than keeps pace with all the good measures we adopt for the improvement of the people. We institute modes by which they can invest their money in savings banks and in building clubs; we start co-operative societies; and yet we see the temptation to spend their earnings in intoxicants is so great that at a time of cessation of labour a large proportion of our working people are plunged into circumstances of the deepest distress.

The working men appeal to this House in order that they may have conferred on them the power to protect themselves. In that appeal I earnestly and sincerely join; and I implore the House not to turn a deaf ear to their cry.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of Licensing the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of Licences should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected, namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system, by some efficient measure of local option,"—
(Sir Wilfrid Lawson,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not rise at this early period of the debate with either the idea or the desire of checking the course of this discussion. On the contrary, I think that the delivery of speeches, full of argument and full of information on a matter of this enormous social interest, is a thing highly valuable and important to the public welfare. But I rise at this time because I thought it my duty to meet without a moment's delay, so far as it depended upon me, the courteous and encouraging invitation addressed to me by my hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment. I understood my hon. Friend to say, at the close of his speech, he did not propose, and he did not much expect me, to give a vote in favour of the adoption at the present time of the Motion; but he hoped no attempt would be made on the part of the Government to bring whatever authority belongs to the Executive Government, as such, to bear on the deliberations of the House, but that everybody should be encouraged to declare his own sentiments, and to vote according to his own belief and judgment in the matter. I can meet that invitation or challenge of my hon. Friend in a manner that I hope will not be unsatisfactory to my hon. Friend. The opinion he entertains on that subject—namely, as to the course the Government ought to take, is an opinion to which we ourselves had arrived. We do not desire to bring any pressure whatever to bear upon the House. I recognize with pleasure the statement of my hon. Friend that it is not in the power of the Government to take largely into its own hands the decision of a question such as this; that it must be content to march with a close and 'sedulous regard to the progress of public opinion; and that, even if it be true—as it is true—that the Government may at a certain stage do something towards ripening or giving form to that public opinion, yet if it places itself in a position entirely apart from, whether in advance or in the rear, it mistakes its functions, and a premature attempt would probably result in reaction or recoil. There are Members of the Government who have voted already in favour of the Resolution of my hon. Friend; and those Members will, so far as I know, renew that vote to-night. I shall not follow my hon. Friend into the Lobby; and I may tell him at once frankly the reason that will lead me to pursue the course which he hinted at as probable on my part. He quotes a case in which I was the Mover of an abstract Resolution—namely, the series of Resolutions in 1868 on the Irish Church Establishment. That is perfectly true; but my hon. Friend will do me the justice of saying that those abstract Resolutions were simply the preface to a Bill which I proposed to introduce, and did introduce and carry through this House. [Sir Wilfrid Lawson: In the same Session?] Yes. Not the Bill to disestablish the Irish Church, because I considered that a dying Parliament was unequal to such a task; but a Bill to arrest all appointments in the Irish Church until after the Election then approaching, in order that legislation might be reserved to the next Parliament. And even as in 1868, when, in proposing a Resolution of this kind, I was prepared to give practical effect to it in a definite form, on which the judgment of the House could be tested, the very same expectation would be, I think, legitimately entertained of me, especially in the place I have now the honour to fill, if I were now to vote in favour of the abstract Resolution of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend will also perceive that I have a greater facility in adopting the course I proposed to take, because the Forms of the House require my hon. Friend to bring on his Motion as an Amendment to Supply, which enables me to deal with him very much as if the Previous Question were raised. He will not suppose that in vindicating this liberty for myself, and in thus conveying my view of my own duty, I intend to censure him. Great as is the inconvenience which attaches to the adoption of abstract Resolutions by this House, yet I am free to confess that hon. Members must naturally be disposed to exercise their own judgments as to the best means of advancing what they think a great public cause, and in many cases they may think they can best attain their purpose by means of an abstract Resolution. I am far from questioning the correctness of their judgment in that respect; but the expectations which will follow their votes are entirely different from those which would be founded on the vote of one occupying my position. I should have been better pleased with the matter of the Resolution if my hon. Friend had included in it some reference to the principle of equitable compensation. I do not want my hon. Friend to commit himself upon that point; but I want a frank recognition of the principle that we are not to deny to publicans, as a class, the benefits of equal treatment, because we think their trade is at so many points in contact with, and even sometimes productive of, great public mischief. Considering the legislative title they have acquired, and the recognition of their position in the proceedings of this House for a long series of years, they ought not to be placed at a disadvantage on account of the particular impression we may entertain—in many cases but too justly—in relation to the mischiefs connected with the present licensing system and the consumption of strong liquors as it is now carried on. Having said this much, it is unnecessary for me to follow my hon. Friends into the argument which they are more competent to conduct than myself; but a few words I will say expressive of my general sympathy. My hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment read at the close of his speech from the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords a very striking passage; and I am bound to say that, individually, I do not think there is a word in that passage which I am not prepared to adopt. My difficulty in this case is not the ordinary difficulty of

of a Government—namely, the want of time and the recent time since we assumed Office—it is the intricacy with which the question itself is surrounded. I do not as yet see my way to any particular measure by which just effect can be given to the principle of my hon. Friend. To that principle itself I am friendly. My hon. Friend, indeed, assigns me a very interesting position in regard to his Motion. He attributes to me the parentage of the words in which it is expressed. A man readily forgets his sins, and occasionally he appears to forget his good deeds; but I was not aware I had any claim to the originality and production of that phrase. But be that as it may, I earnestly entertain the hope that at some not very distant period it may be found practicable to deal with the Licensing Laws, and in dealing with them to include the reasonable and just application of the principle for which my hon. Friend contends. We all go together up to a certain point. We all recognize and allow that the evils of intoxication are not merely grave, but monstrous. Their extent, and their depth, and their intensity, need hardly be described; but, having made that admission, our paths begin to diverge. There are those who say, as has been justly stated by my hon. Friend the Secunder of the Motion, that nothing can be done by legislation; that mechanical means cannot cure moral evils; that we must not deal with the subject by mere prohibition, but must trust to the progress of civilized habits and moral convictions. I do not agree with those who say that legislation is of no avail in this matter. Legislation has great power in removing positive sources of temptation, and the question will be to what extent, in what manner, and under what conditions legislation can be employed at the suitable moment for the purpose of lessening or removing those sources of temptation either in cases where the principles adopted are capable of a universal application, or in cases where it may be thought requisite to give to the local judgment of the population an influence in the matter. I do not agree with those who say that any legislation in the direction of my hon. Friend's wishes must be class legislation; because I think he and the Secunder of the Resolution are right in holding that it is eminently and peculiarly from among the people themselves that the movement and the expression of sympathy and desire for a measure of this kind proceeds. It is not among the great, it is not among the rich, it is not among the wealthy, it is not exclusively, at any rate, among the educated and enlightened. It is, to a great extent, a true genuine instinct of the popular mind which disposes so many of our fellow-citizens to desire to call in the action of external restraints in aid of their own best inclinations, and to assist them in resistance to those inclinations which they regret. For myself, I certainly am one of those who, regarding the general structure of the Licensing Law, are thoroughly and radically dissatisfied with it. But here I must say what will not give pleasure to my Friends, I am no believer in monopoly, either in this or any other matter. Parliament has been busy for about 10 years in building and bolstering up monopolies, in adding to the artificial values which attach to property invested in public-houses, and which, in my opinion, are by far the most deadly and inveterate enemies with which my hon. Friend has to deal; and, therefore, I do not claim any credit from my hon. Friend for being individually indisposed to work in the direction of those measures with regard to monopoly which appear to proceed upon the assumption that by increasing its range you restrict and mitigate its miseries. I believe the exact reverse. I believe that in proportion as you mount up higher and higher, these simply prohibitory laws, tending to restrict numbers and enhance and augment values, you multiply and raise to a higher point the obstacles with which you have to deal. I do not wish to be drawn into any premature conclusion; but it is only fair to make the admission. But with regard to the question which my hon. Friend has brought before us, I will say these two things in conclusion. First of all, that I believe that one of the great subjects which will call for the attention of the Executive at as early a period as the heavy competing pressure of some other subjects will permit will be the reform of the Licensing Laws; and, secondly, I believe that that reform is so eminently called for, and is so favoured by the circumstances in which we now stand, that I regard it as an essential part of the work and mission of the present Parliament. I have no prejudices upon this subject; but I am glad to have at least the pardon, if not the approval, of my hon. Friend, if I decline to express by my vote distinct adhesion to an expression of abstract principle on the subject until I feel myself armed with the possession of some practical plan that I am in a condition to recommend for the approval of Parliament. With these observations, I recommend the question to the consideration of the House of Commons.

SIR ROBERT CUNLIFFE: Sir, I rise to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments whilst I refer to the reasons why I think the proposition which is now before the House deserves its favourable consideration, and to the position in which we stand in regard to this question. Now, Sir, I think no one will deny that there exists outside this House a very strong opinion in favour of some legislation with regard to this matter; and I think it is true to say that that strong opinion exists not only with regard to those who may be considered the supporters of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, in regard to the measure before us, but it exists widely throughout the whole country. Although we have had within the last 10 years two Licensing Acts, and although these have done much to improve the licensing system, yet I think we stand in regard to this great evil of intemperance in a very unsatisfactory position. Now, Sir, I should not presume to make that statement to the House as embodying my own opinion or any knowledge of my own; but I will take two authorities whose opinion, I think, will be treated with respect. The first authority I quote is a sentence from a speech of Lord Aberdare, in introducing the Bill of 1871. Lord Aberdare said—

“He would not pause to ask whether drunkenness was or was not on the increase, for he felt satisfied that the evil was so great as to be a blot upon our social system, and a disgrace to our civilization.”—[3 Hansard, ccv. 1063.]

He was then the Home Secretary, speaking from his place in Parliament. Now nearly 10 years have elapsed, and what is the state of the question now? I will only refer to the paragraph which has been already mentioned by the hon. Member for Carlisle, and which has made a great deal of impression upon the Prime Minister. The Committee of the House of Lords say in a paragraph where they discuss the Bill founded on the Gothenburg system brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade—

“All that general legislation has hitherto been able to effect has been some improvement in general order, while it has been powerless to produce any perceptible decrease of intemperance.”

And, Sir, it cannot be said that public attention has not constantly been called to this question, which I take to be another proof of the strong feeling out-of-doors. I think on 10 different occasions since 1869 the hon. Member for Carlisle has brought this question before us. It has come up before the House year after year like a hardy perennial, only to be rejected; but still he has brought it up. In addition to that we have had an interesting Bill brought in by the President of the Board of Trade founded on the Gothenburg system; and we have had a Bill for Licensing Boards, brought in by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), which has produced an interesting discussion. Lastly, we have had a Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone), which I regretted to see the other day, in consequence of the pressure of Business, produced only a short discussion in this House. These are all more or less based on the principle we are asked to vote upon to-night. I am one of many persons who have never been able to persuade themselves that the measure which was brought in by the hon. Member for Carlisle is the best that could be adopted to solve the difficulty. Although I shall give my vote in favour of his Motion, I shall consider myself perfectly free on some future occasion to take a different course on some other Bill that may be brought forward. I may quote some words used on the last occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), who said—

“He should vote for the present Resolution, and, having voted for it, would feel that he was just as free to deal with the drink question . . . as if he had never heard of the Permissive Bill, and as if the present Resolution had never been before them.”—[Ibid. ccli. 497.]

Now, I will venture to quote one more passage from the speech of Lord Aberdare in 1871, which appears to me to cover the ground for the reasons why we should vote for some measure of Local Option. Lord Aberdare said we should create some strong vigorous opinion in the different localities, and he concluded with these words—

“He was satisfied, therefore, that if they were to create a wholesome and vigorous public opinion on that subject, they must give the ratepayers of the country some direct control over it, and that the more widely that control could, without injustice, be extended, the greater would be the social advantage.”—[Ibid. ccv. 1075.]

I think the words I have read to the House afford ample grounds for the Resolution now before us. It has been remarked in the debate that this proposal appears to cast some blame on the magistrates as the present licensing authorities. I am not able to follow that; but I may be permitted to say that the Lords' Committee speak with approval of “confirming authority,” and they think the value of their confirming authority is acknowledged by several witnesses as a check on the granting authority. It is thought some check should be placed on the licensing; but I think the magistrates have erred by allowing too many licences. But if we can by some measure give the ratepayers some means of bringing power to bear on the licensing authorities, we shall get rid of those difficulties and evils which occur under the present system. I should like to refer for a moment to a speech made by a Gentleman who is greatly respected by this House—Mr. Rathbone. The few words I wish to quote were delivered in this House during the discussion on the Motion by the hon. Member for Newcastle. Mr. Rathbone gave an interesting account of what had taken place in the suburban district of Woolton, near Liverpool, where, during nine years, the “Free licensing system” had been adopted. He said they steadily refused renewal to disorderly houses, and they kept the same numbers in spite of increase of population. He added—

“I do not hesitate to say that the magistrates and police of England, if they would only enforce the existing laws, have ample powers in their hands to shut up one-third of the public-houses, and reduce, by at least a quarter, the crime of the Kingdom by simply refusing to renew the licences of any houses doing a disorderly trade.”—[Ibid. ccxxix. 908.]

But do not we require more direct and complete pressure put upon the licensing authorities in this country by those more immediately affected by the consequences? Mr. Rathbone gave an interesting account of a very respectable licensed victualler in Liverpool, said to be doing a high-class trade there; but who stated that, in consequence of the greater stringency of the police and the magistrates, his takings had been reduced by £700 a-year. I think that shows that, although the present law is imperfect, it is possible to administer it in a better manner to meet the social requirements of the age. Mr. Rathbone asked the House to consider

“What an amount of evil and demoralization preventable under the present law, if strictly administered, that £700 a-year represents.”—[Ibid.]

What is the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Lords, who obtained great weight in this House because of the noble Lords composing the Committee, and because of the moderation of the Report they brought up? The Committee were unable to recommend Licensing Boards; but they recommended that County Boards or Local Boards should be established with an extensive area, and that the licensing power should be transferred to those bodies. I think in those Boards there would be an elective element to represent the ratepayers. If that is so, Sir, we should have that elective principle introduced in the Licensing Boards of the country, which will give the ratepayers that control over the licensing which is so much wanted at the present moment. Now, Sir, I will not detain the House any longer; but I would just point out that the Committee further recommended that legislative facilities should be afforded for the local adoption of the Gothenburg and Mr. Chamberlain's schemes. I think that is a high recommendation of the principle of Local Option, in some measure to be approved by the legislation of this House; and the object of that would be to control and absorb some of the licences now existing. The Prime Minister alluded to that difficult point, how compensation could be given if Parliament determined to reduce the number of public-houses. That brings me to the seventh recommendation of the Committee of the House of Lords, in which they point out

“That a considerable increase should be made in the licence duties.”

Many hon. Members are aware that by the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Scarborough it was proposed to devote a portion of the funds derived from licences for compensation to the existing public-houses. The Committee say, further, that the “Size of the premises, the profits of the trade, and, consequently, the value of the licences, have increased enormously during the last 10 years.”

If that is true, I think it is an element which we might fairly take into consideration when we come to deal with this question in some practical Bill; because, as the Committee say—

“The public are fairly entitled to a larger share than they have hitherto received of the profits of a monopoly thus artificially created.”

I will not detain the House any longer. I thank you for listening to me with so much patience. I will only venture to add that I rose principally to express my earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government will, at some future day, be able to deal with this important question; and I think, from what has fallen from the Prime Minister, we may venture to anticipate that something will be done. If the Government will deal with the question, I am sure they will have attempted to achieve an object worthy of the ambition of any Ministry, and which will entitle them to the lasting gratitude of the whole country.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, they were all agreed as to the ill effects of intemperance, and they would all be glad to know of some means by which they could be remedied without injury to vested and existing interests. But all this Resolution pretended to do was to transfer the power of granting licences from one body to another. That would not put an end to intemperance. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) said his Resolution had its beginning in a Resolution of Convocation; but his experience of life was that a clergyman was the worst man in the world to grapple with a practical difficulty. The proposal of the hon. Baronet came before them in the objectionable form of an abstract Resolution, which appeared to be aimed somewhat at the magistrates. The hon. Baronet wanted to give the power now possessed by the magistrates to the ratepayers of each district; but it must be remembered that the ratepayers were only about one-third of the inhabitants of a district. That was stopping half-way; but if the hon. Baronet went to the extreme, he would give the licensing power to a much worse authority than the magistrates. The licensing power, if Local Option were carried out, would be given to those who used public-houses most, and that was like giving a child a knife to play with because he had cut his fingers. The logical conclusion of this Resolution was that because men got drunk, therefore those men should have the power to license public-houses. It had been said that there were too many public-houses in the land, and why did not the magistrates put them down? Well, since 1869, the magistrates had closed 9,000 public-houses. He had received a paper from Manchester asking him not to vote for this Resolution, and it came from the National Union for the Suppression of Intemperance. Surely such a Society knew whether Local Option would promote temperance or not; and he found they were against this Motion. This Resolution was a slight on the magistracy—a slight on a body of men who, as the “great unpaid,” had done their work in a most worthy and exemplary manner. No one would believe that an elective body would be so independent as the magistrates, and they ought to go to the higher classes rather than to the lower classes to find a proper licensing body. He maintained that the magistrates were the best licensing authority; they lived in the place, and were independent of any improper influence that might be brought to bear upon them. In conclusion, he would vote against the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, and in favour of the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: The hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down has delivered a eulogy on the magistrates of this country which I am very far from saying they do not generally deserve. In reference to the administration of their functions in connection with licensing, the magistrates deserve, I think, as much praise as they do in regard to the performance of any part of their business. It is quite clear from all the Reports before the House that they have not extended the distribution of licences unduly, and that they have had, so far as they could have, general regard for the rights of those whose capital is invested in this description of property, and that they have also exercised, on the whole, a judicious and careful control, so far as they could, over the management of public-houses. When my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle commenced his speech he said that Local Option was a mysterious term. I quite agree with him in that. I should have much preferred to hear him use the words “local control,” because that part of his Resolution which is most intelligible to myself, and with which I am in perfect and entire accord, is that which says that the representation of the people in this matter—which is to them of such deep and vital social importance—should be in their own hands—that they should have, as I contend they have a right to have, local control in this matter. Now, the people of this country are not represented by the magistrates. However excellent may be character and conduct of those who are appointed to the magistracy in this country, I repeat that the people—the working men and working people generally, of whom I have the honour to represent a large section in the House tonight—have not confidence in the representation they possess in this great matter. It has happened to me, in a much shorter political experience than that of many hon. Members of this House, to feel it my duty twice to call the attention of Her Majesty’s Government to the appointment of certain magistrates. In 1873, when, as now, the country had the advantage of the services of the distinguished ornament of this House, in the Office of Prime Minister, I had a temporary and interesting connection with the borough of Huntingdon. On one occasion in that year I felt it my duty to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the neglect of the Lord Lieutenant to give a fair representation to a large minority in the county who were Nonconformists. The Prime Minister thought proper to reply to me condemning the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant of Huntingdonshire, in regard to the fact that there was not a single Nonconformist on the Bench of the county. Well, the Lord Lieutenant of Huntingdonshire took cognizance in a very careful manner of the right hon. Gentleman’s complaint, and within a year or 18 months he so far saw the error of his ways as to make the magistracy of the county more representative by placing two Nonconformists on the Bench. In the present year, again, I have felt it my duty to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) to the appointments in that county with which I have now a happy and I hope a permanent connection. Now the borough of Southport—and I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) in his place, because this matter is of peculiar interest to himself—the borough of Southport, I say, is, as the late Home Secretary knows perfectly well, and as is known in the county of Lancaster, thoroughly liberal in its sentiments. The Town Council of Southport, or a large majority of the members of it, is Liberal in opinion; but when it was proposed, on the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross), to grant a Commission of the Peace to the borough, Her Majesty's late Government thought proper to place 11 Conservatives and 4 Liberals on the Bench. Now this Bench of Magistrates is the licensing authority for the borough of Southport. I shall be extremely glad if the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) will tell me that in this borough, where three-fourths, or nearly three-fourths, of the Town Council are Liberals, and which, as he knows very well in regard to the late Election, is thoroughly Liberal, the character of the magistracy is representative. I should like him to tell me this, for I have no doubt he intends to take part in this debate. I myself know, on the best authority—that the people of Southport have no confidence in the appointments made by the late Government as to the magistracy. Let me suppose that the magistrates of Southport thought proper to imitate the example of the magistrates of another portion of South-West Lancashire—namely, Liverpool. It is not long ago since Liverpool magistrates declared free trade in liquor. Suppose the magistrates of Southport, through a freak of fancy of their own, were to say that the people of that borough, should in future have free trade in liquor. I say that these magistrates have no right to claim in regard to such subjects that they represent the people. This, I consider, would be a gross travestie of representative power. When I listened to the hon. Member for Carlisle, I must say I regretted that he was not more explicit in regard to the terms of this Resolution, and I would ask the House to bear with me while I endeavour to state what is the interpretation which I place upon them. Many people who read the words of this Resolution—which is somewhat dark in its phraseology—are inclined, especially in country districts, to suppose that it has some concealed intention of confiscating the licences which have been given throughout the country. Now, I want to speak very plainly indeed upon this subject. What is the position of the man who possesses a licence for a public-house? We know very well that that licence is renewable from year to year; and that it is impossible to disguise from ourselves that there is a belief largely spread throughout the country that this Resolution means, or may be held to mean, that these licences will be liable to be forfeited by a popular vote given in regard to that particular matter. Now, I can only say for myself that I regard a licence possessed by the man who has the privilege of holding that licence for the sale of wine and spirits as a very substantial property—and I will tell the House why—because there is in regard to that licence every feature of property. Men have made investments from time to time upon the faith of those licences. The houses to which the licences belong are bought and sold every day at very large prices, and men exhibit, in the confidence with which they deal in property of this description, and in the confidence with which their investments are made, and through the neglect of Parliament to issue any substantial warning to the contrary, a belief that they are dealing with what is real and substantial property, and I hold and maintain that these men have in these licences a substantial property, which has been treated and dealt with as property. A newspaper of very large circulation and great influence in the neighbourhood I have the honour to represent spoke of me not very long ago in regard to something I had written about the land, and said I was almost too tender with regard to the rights of property. I think it is impossible for anyone who attempts seriously to undertake the work of reform to deal too tenderly with the rights of property. The foundation of success in regard to the work of reform is to pay due and proper and consistent respect to the rights of property. [Cheers.] Well, now, the cheers of the House lead me to believe that there is a very general belief and impression on the part of the majority that I rightly describe the condition of licences when I say that they are substantial property. If they are admitted to be such, then I pass on to say that I hold it to be one of the most important functions of Parliament to remember at all times that this House is, first and above all, the trustee of property throughout the country. A primary duty of Parliament is to remember that every description of property is held in trust by this House. No man's title-deed is worth much if the opinion of this House is against him; and therefore this House must always, I humbly submit, remember that its clear duty is to regard the rights of property as its own possession, and never, under any circumstances whatever, to delegate the dealing with these rights of property to any other authority in the country. I have heard it said that inasmuch as a licence is granted by local authority, that that which the local authority has conceded that also it should be able to take back at any time; that it should be able to decree that the person to whom it granted a licence should at any time forfeit that licence. I should like to show the House why in this matter that is an unsound and unsafe doctrine. It is true the local authority is empowered to grant licences under certain conditions; but if the House holds, as I certainly do, that these licences when granted constitute a property, then we must remember that the local authorities are not empowered under the conditions on which the property is intrusted to them by this House to withdraw the concession they have made. The local authority is empowered to make streets and ways through the town—to improve the means of intercommunication throughout the town; but when the local authority has made a street—for which purpose it need not apply to Parliament—it has not the power subsequently to disturb the property built upon the street which has been opened,

and declared to be the use of the public for ever. There is no power in the local authority to deal with that property except by an application to Parliament. We have in this House almost every day Provisional Orders lying on the Table, which are to sanction the exercise by these local authorities of special powers for taking property under the sanction of Parliament. Having laid it down that there is a property in the licences, I say it is not competent for the House to give to any local authority the power of confiscating that property without compensation in the usual way. But there is one description of property connected with licences which I certainly desire to see taken advantage of by the local authority for the benefit of the public. I will give an instance which came under my own observation the other day. In a suburb of London a piece of land was laid out for a building estate, and the builder thought proper to devote a central position to a licensed public-house. The erection of the house cost him about £1,900, all told, and he obtained a licence for it, and there was a strict condition in connection with the building estate that there should be no other licensed house upon the property. Well, having expended only £1,900 on the building of this house, the builder sold it last week to a gentleman I know very well, who is a brewer, for £4,000. So that he pocketed £2,100 for the privilege of the exercise of the monopoly of selling intoxicating drink in this country. I am most anxious that a due and proper share of large sums of this sort accruing in that manner should be taken for the public advantage, and I should very much indeed like to see that £2,100, or a proper proportion of it in the exercise of local control, taken for the advantage of the public. I want only to say, in conclusion, that the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) referred to this matter being settled by something like a simple counting of heads or votes. If I understood the hon. and gallant Member rightly, his complaint was that we had not universal suffrage, and his contention that all men and women should have votes. If he were to make a proposition of that kind at any time, I think he would find less objection to it on this side of the House than on the other. He said there was no good reason whatever why the people should take this matter in some form or other under their own control. What good, I believe he asked, could follow from it? Surely the hon. and gallant Member has had no experience of the value of the uses of responsibility. If the people were in some degree responsible for all that is obnoxious in connection with this trade, would they not be more careful and critical with regard to the manner in which the trade is carried on? I wish before I sit down to pay such tribute as I may to the services in the great cause of temperance which have been rendered by the hon. Member for Carlisle and those who co-operate with him. I think it a great and honourable and useful thing in all matters connected with the social well-being of the people that, as far as possible, an ideal should be lifted up before their eyes. There is not a loftier idea of virtue conceivable by many of the people than the idea of total abstinence. I honour that idea. It is never likely that the people will worship or follow ideals too readily. Ideals may be brought before them; and it is possible that the men who spend their lives in upholding these uncompromising ideals will do more than their fellows towards bringing about the time when we shall make some approach towards that blessed ideal of life when force shall be used always in concert with, and controlled by, reason, when strength shall be used for its most legitimate purpose—the protection and the welfare of the weak—to that blessed time when there shall be no complaining in our streets, and when our garners shall be full, yielding all manner of store.

LORD ELCHO congratulated the hon. Member who had just sat down upon the very healthy and welcome views he had enunciated with regard to the rights of property, views which could not be traced in the Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government, which was in the course of its second reading, nor in the clause which had formed part of it, but which was now about to re-appear in shape of a new Bill. But he would not pursue that matter further. The hon. Member for Carlisle had suggested that he (Lord Elcho) had inherited the Parliamentary mantle of Mr. Wheelhouse, the late Member for Leeds. He laid claim to no such inheritance; and the only reason why he ventured to address the House for the first time on this subject was that he had had the honour of being intrusted with a Petition for presentation against the Resolution by the Scottish Wine, Spirit, and Beer Trade Defence Association. Why it should have been intrusted to him he knew not. The hon. Member who last spoke seemed to think that everybody's chance of success at the late Election turned upon the question of Local Option. He could only say that during the Election it was not heard of in East Lothian; but he was not able to speak for Mid Lothian. He agreed to present the Petition because he heartily approved of its terms, and of the reasons why the Petitioners were opposed to the Resolution of the hon. Baronet. They were opposed to it because they objected to this transfer of the licensing power from what they called a judicial body to such an injudicial body, if he might so use the term, as a majority simply of the ratepayers. The Petitioners stated that those who now administered the licensing system exercised their power with judgment and fairness, and where they could they suppressed licences with the view, as far as they could, of making them proportioned to the number of inhabitants, and that if this system were departed from they would have an arbitrary and capricious system of constant agitation, constant voting, and the expenses of another Local Board. But it was not the publicans only who took that view. An Association which had existed for years for the suppression of intemperance were exactly of the same opinion, and he rather gathered from the Prime Minister that he favoured the view taken by that Association. The opinion of the Petitioners was that if this question was referred to the decision of a majority, it would be to infringe liberty and endanger property. He quite agreed with that. The last speaker had said he did not understand the Motion, and that it was indistinct. The Motion might be indistinct; but nothing could be clearer than the speech in which it was introduced. They were urged to vote for Local Option because it did not necessarily mean suppression, but only restriction. His hon. Friend, however, was too honest to stop there, and he added that he wished to suppress the liquor traffic altogether. In this free country it would be an intolerable state of things to establish that a majority of the ratepayers—half the ratepayers of a district plus one—should lay down a law which would prevent the other half, minus one, who might be most temperate men, from being able to take a glass of beer or spirits in that district. Some years ago he had the pleasure of reading in an essay written by the present Postmaster General an expression of opinion strongly opposed to State intervention in matters such as were proposed to be dealt with by the hon. Member for Carlisle; and in the same article the writer stated that individual liberty had been “constantly subject to attacks from various phases of fanaticism.” Interesting information on this subject was also to be found in a small book called Prohibitory Legislation in the United States, recently published by Mr. Justin M’Carthy, who had visited the State of Maine with the view of studying the question, and he had come to the conclusion that “this legislation had not only failed, but had incidentally produced very serious mischief.” He (Lord Elcho) had a very nice gentleman as one of his constituents, a man unconvicted of any crime, who was not a Roman Catholic, who therefore did not necessarily fast; he believed he was a United Presbyterian or a Free Churchman—he doubted whether he was a member of the Established Church—and what did they think this gentleman had done? He had put himself on bread and water, and occasionally he indulged in the luxury of an apple. That was his sole subsistence, and he had never seen a more healthy man, or one who looked younger for his years. And why did he live in that way? Because he was convinced that all the ills to which flesh was heir came from eating meat, and they had almost half a convert to that system in the Home Secretary, who objected to their eating hares and rabbits. If this principle of Local Option was to prevail, what was to prevent hon. Members from coming to Parliament and moving a Local Option Resolution which would enable a majority of the ratepayers of any district to put the rest of the inhabitants of that district, every man, woman, and child, on bread and water, with an occasional apple? The principle was exactly the same, and he protested alike against the one and the other in the interest of liberty and freedom in this country. The property objection had been gone into by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold), and was also touched upon by the Prime Minister, who deprecated all idea of confiscation. The hon. Member for Carlisle was not so clear on the question of compensation and confiscation. He was much clearer on the question of suppression altogether. From his speech they might gather that he was opposed to compensation. The hon. Member looked upon every publican as such a criminal that he thought it his duty to take his property from him, and fine him in every farthing. But the Prime Minister had a different view. He was clear upon the question of compensation. Everything else was dark, but compensation was very clear. He recollected the “Ten Minutes Licensing Bill” of Mr. Bruce (now Lord Aberdare) in the Parliament before last, in which there was a clause which shook every man’s notions and feelings of security as regarded property, because it empowered either ratepayers or the State to forfeit every publican’s licence at the end of 10 years. If there was anything which turned out the Liberal Government of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), and brought in the Conservatives, it was the shock which legislation such as that gave. [Laughter.] Yes; they might laugh. That was his honest conviction, for it was the climax to the harassing of interests. Every other interest was induced to fear for itself in consequence of the way in which it was proposed to deal with the Licensed Victuallers. He was inclined to think that the habit of harassing interests had grown so inveterate that the Government had found it stronger than themselves. They were at their old work again; and, if they did not take care, it would produce the old results. The Prime Minister declined to vote for Local Option. [Mr. Gladstone said, he voted for going into Committee of Supply.] He (Lord Elcho) was correct in stating that the right hon. Gentleman would not vote for the Local Option Resolution. He preferred the policy which was the favourite policy of his first Government upon the North West Frontier of India—a policy of masterly inactivity. He wished to hold a middle position. He did not consider it the duty of the Government to take up a position in advance, but in media tutissimus to follow a policy of masterly inactivity. That was not the policy for a Government to pursue on a great question. It was their duty to endeavour to guide public opinion even at the risk of defeat; and, if they could not maintain a principle which they believed to be right, rather than yield to the stream, they should abide the consequences. That was his idea of the duty of a Government. It might be a wrong one; but, individually speaking, he would rather fall, taking such a view of the duties of Government, than stand up for any number of years for a policy of masterly inactivity. He believed this legislation was proposed at a time when it was not necessary. He heartily sympathized with every Member who desired by every possible means to repress intemperance. But the Resolution was introduced at a time when far from intemperance being on the increase there were many signs of improvement. About 50 years ago, when he was a boy, it was the custom in the hospitable North for the butler to allow four bottles for every private guest. [An Irish MEMBER: Four bottles of what?] Of wine. In his own family there was a china bowl around which his ancestors had sat for three days and three nights draining the whisky punch the bowl contained. He only mentioned these things to show what the state of matters was in the upper classes of society 100 years ago, and to show the improvement that had taken place since. On Whit Monday two years ago he visited the Alexandra Palace. The building was crowded, and yet up to 6 o'clock when he left he could swear that he had not seen a single drunken person. Of course, he did not vouch for what occurred afterwards. He believed the same could be said of the crowd at the Crystal Palace. A time when such an improvement was taking place in the habits of society was not a time to propose legislation of this kind—legislation which he held to be wrong in principle, as wrong as if a Member of that House were to bring in a Bill to prohibit the Queen's subjects from eating roast beef.

MR. CAINE: I have listened for two hours and three quarters to the debate in the hope of hearing a single argument against the Resolution of my hon. Friend; but beyond the fact that the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) went to the Alexandra Palace, when it was full inside and out, and that up to 6 o'clock on a Whit Monday he saw no drunkenness, I have not heard anything against the Resolution. The noble Lord, however, did not tell us what occurred at the Alexandra Palace after the time at which he left. I can assure the noble Lord that if such a Bill as he has referred to were introduced, and it was shown that roast beef did as much harm to the community as it is abundantly proved is done by strong drink, I, for one, would cordially support a measure to prohibit its public sale. I am assensible of the rights of property as any man in this House; but, at the same time, I am equally as mindful of the rights and aspirations of the poor. This is essentially a working man's question. They are unable to get away from the evil influences of the public-houses that surround them. There is a district well known in Liverpool, comprising Addison and other streets and the courts off them. The death-rate in those streets was 45 per 1,000. I have had the frontage of them measured up, and the frontage of the private houses is 2,514 feet, whilst the frontage of the public-houses in those streets is 425 feet, so that the public-house frontage is a seventh of the whole. In the same year in which the death-rate was 45 per 1,000, the death rate in the district in which I resided was 11 per 1,000, and in that district there were no public-houses. The Corporation was naturally alarmed at such a death-rate, and sent for two scientific men, whose names are well known—Dr. Parkes and Dr. Sanderson—to investigate the condition of the town. This is what they said in regard to it—

“We found the landlord of a small public-house who had been for years in the district and knew the habits of the people who resided there, and he told us that for one man who did not drink, 50 took their share, they starved their wives and children, who had to beg for what they got. We examined a few cases, one of a tinsmith who earns 22s. a-week, and he said he drank a little, and then owned he drank very heavily. The wife told us that sometimes he brought home 8s., sometimes 12s., and sometimes drank it all, and she said she should be very happy and comfortable if she could have the whole of the 22s. a-week. They were living in a back room for which they paid 3s. 6d. a-week. In the front room of the same house, the rent of which was 2s. a-week, a man, his wife, his son and daughter lived. The man earned 24s. a-week, and spent it in drinking, and the wife drank all she could get.”

And so on instance after instance. But there are other districts in Liverpool equally beset by public-houses. Hon. Members in this House very often speak about the welfare of the seamen, and let me tell them that within a few yards of the Sailors' Home, completely surrounding it, there are 47 liquor shops, and there are 99 within 200 yards of the Liverpool Exchange. In a single year in Liverpool, the year 1874, no less than 23,303 persons of both sexes were brought up before the magistrates charged with being drunk and disorderly. Now, the law states if any person permits drunkenness he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding, for the first offence, £10, and for any subsequent offence not exceeding £20. I will not take up the time of the House by dilating on the evils that arise in society at large from 23,303 persons being found drunk in a single year in one town; but I will state that the number of publicans who were proceeded against in that year for permitting drunkenness were only three. Under the existing laws working men cannot get away from the public-house. There are trams, 'buses, and increased railway facilities now in nearly all our large towns, so that the working men are getting away from the centres of the towns; but the public-houses follow them. For some time the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool refused to license more public-houses; but some way or other in time past they have licensed over 2,500 of them. When a district is formed and built upon in the suburbs of Liverpool the public-houses manage to get out to them, under the law of "removals;" and during the last 15 or 20 years I have collected a great number of such cases at the annual Licensing Sessions. Thomas Kidd, a publican, at the corner of Cecil Street and the Wavertree Road, applied at the annual Licensing Session for the removal of the licence from a house in town to this house in the suburbs. Mr. Picton, one of the magistrates, opposed the removal, and went into the witness-box and gave evidence. He stated that he had no personal interest in the matter; but there was an average of one public-house for every 30 yards already, and unless the whole neighbourhood were abandoned drunkards he did not see how it was possible for a landlord to get a living. The end of the matter was that the magistrates refused to remove the licence; but at the Licensing Sessions held six months afterwards the same application was renewed, and the decision previously given was reversed, and the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Whitley) voted with the majority for the granting of the transfer. That course of action has been pursued by the Liverpool Bench of Magistrates over and over again. I do not desire to impute any motives to those magistrates who act in this matter; the freaks of the licensing magistrates are so various that we should never be surprised at anything they do; but the fact is clear from this, that when working men desire to get out of the temptation that besets them, the public-houses follow them under the existing laws, and in consequence their failure is due to the Bench of Magistrates. I have no desire to take up the time of the House any longer. What we ask for by this Resolution is that, instead of the granting and renewing of public-houses being continued in the hands of the Bench of Magistrates, who are responsible only to the Home Secretary, it will be infinitely better that the whole question be relegated to the ratepayers themselves, and that they should have the power to protect themselves from the evils of the liquor traffic.

COLONEL BARNE said, he must congratulate the Prime Minister on the course he had taken in saying that he should not vote for the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). No explanation had been given by the hon. Member for Carlisle of the manner in which he proposed that licences should be granted. Did he mean that licensing power was to be given to the majority of the ratepayers? The question was essentially one for the working man; and such being the case, he (Colonel Barne) maintained that a Parliament formed upon household suffrage would be much more capable of settling it than the present. In agricultural districts there were very few ratepayers in proportion to the number of inhabitants; in some instances only five or six in a population of 200 or 300. If, therefore, the licensing power were put into the hands of the ratepayers, a great injustice would be done to the labouring population. He opposed the Resolution on the ground that it was an interference with the liberty of the subject.

COLONEL BURNABY said, as a member of the body of 4,500 magistrates in the country, he denied that there was any truth in the statement that they had not faithfully discharged the duties committed to their trust in the matter of licensing. He maintained that the main body of his fellow-countrymen had implicit confidence in the integrity of the magistracy, and would sum up his remarks by saying—"Trust us in all, or not at all."

MR. WARTON, who rose amid loud cries of "Divide," expressed his opinion that the discussion on this important Motion, which might lead to momentous consequences, ought not to be cut short. The subject was worth a few hours, if not a longer time, for discussion. ["Divide!"] He could not understand the reason of those noises, which were beautiful in their variety, but which would not, in the slightest degree, change his determination to address the House. He stood there to give utterance, to the best of his ability, to what seemed to him to be worthy of consideration. The sooner the noises ceased, the sooner he should finish his speech. It was in the discretion of his hon. Friends opposite to prolong his remarks for an hour, or to allow them to come to a close in the course of 20 minutes. It had been said that no arguments of importance had been adduced against the Motion on that side of the House. ["Divide!"] If his hon. Friends opposite would allow him to be heard he would try to adduce some arguments against it. He complained of the interruption with which he was met, and expressed a hope that the Speaker would check it. ["Order!" "Chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was addressing himself to other Members of the House, and not to the Chair.

MR. WARTON said, the noise had confused him. He humbly accepted the correction. Local Option meant an assumed right of the majority of a district to control the rights of the minority. There were many cases in which a minority ought to give way; but not in matters of personal conduct, of which each man was himself the best judge. The principle of Local Option involved an act of tyranny that was peculiarly characteristic of the Liberal Party, who were the friends of freedom in theory rather than in practice. He protested against Local Option also on the ground that it was based on an ethical fallacy, and held that true morality permitted moderate indulgence without avowing distrust in a man's power of self-control.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That, inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of Licensing the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of Licences should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected, namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system, by some efficient measure of local option.

DUNGANNON WRIT.

MOTION FOR NEW WRIT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown (Ireland) to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Dungannon, in the room of Thomas Alexander Dickson, esquire, whose Election hath been determined to be void."—(Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consent to postpone the issuing of this Writ for a few days, in the same way that the Writ at Evesham had been proposed. He was aware that there was this small difference—that in the Return of the Judges in the Evesham case, there was a peculiar phrase used—

"That from the evidence before us, and to which we confined our attention, we have no reason to believe that extensive bribery and corruption prevailed in this case."

The Judges, however, did, in the present case, not say that they actually were satisfied that corruption had not prevailed, but merely that it was so on the evidence placed before them. He (Sir George Campbell) had been looking at two or three Election Returns, and the evidence given before the Judges; and it was perfectly clear that, in a great majority of cases, the Judges did not consider themselves bound to make any inquisition into the actual facts of the election, but only considered the evidence the parties chose to give. Now, it was notorious that, in the great majority of cases, the parties petitioning merely proved enough to serve their own purpose, and did not at all care to give evidence from which general bribery and corruption might be inferred. They were asked, in this case, to issue a new Writ without knowing whether or not extensive bribery and corruption prevailed. In illustration of the point he wished to make, he might allude to the Gravesend Election, where not only the two Parties abstained from giving evidence on the question whether general bribery had prevailed, but the Judges actually stopped parties who were going to give evidence, and declared that a sufficient case had been made out without going into the minutiae which one of the counsel had alluded to. On a suggestion of that kind coming from the Judge, the counsel for the Petitioner did stop his case, and was content not to adduce further evidence; but the displaced Member wanted to go on, and the Judges actually warned him that if he did so it would be at his own peril. He must draw attention to the very peculiar words, for instance, used by one of the Judges, when he remarked that that was not an inquisitorial tribunal sent there to make an absolutely exhaustive Report to the Speaker of the House of all the ramifications and details of election. They had it on the authority of one of the Judges themselves that they did not consider it necessary for them to go into all the details connected with each election. Then he might again allude to another case, that of Bandon. There a Petition was presented and was abandoned. The Judges asked why it was, and then they reported that there was no evidence to show that the abandonment of the Petition was the result of a corrupt bargain; but it was perfectly notorious what the reason was for the abandonment of that Petition. The case was notoriously so bad, that the sitting Member could not defend his seat; and the bargain was that, on the Petition being withdrawn, he should apply for the Chiltern Hundreds. Surely that was conclusive evidence that the Judges did not consider it was necessary to inquire into the real facts of this election. He (Sir George Campbell) did not say, in the particular case of Dungannon, there had been extensive bribery; but they knew perfectly well that in point of numbers it was a rotten borough, and rotten in the extreme. The place only contained about 3,800 inhabitants, which was one-twentieth part of the average of the constituencies of England and Scotland; and, therefore, it was not a case in which there was any real necessity for the issue of a Writ immediately. He only asked to have time to examine the evidence returned by the Judges, in order that the House might see whether there had been such bribery or corruption as to make further inquiry desirable. He would move that the issue of the Writ be postponed for a week.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the issue of the Writ for the Borough of Dungannon be postponed for one week," — (Sir George Campbell,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) trusted the House would not accede to this request. He must, in the first place, protest against the position which the hon. Member (Sir George Campbell) had taken up in thus attacking and stigmatizing a borough of which he confessedly knew nothing. He must remind the House that every constituency had a right to return its Representative or

Sir George Campbell

Representatives to Parliament; and he trusted that no one would be permitted to deprive the electors of the borough of Dungannon of their legal rights. The hon. Gentleman actually wanted the issue of the Writ to be delayed for a week, until the shorthand notes and evidence should be printed; and, no doubt, if they were not ready by the end of the week which he now asked for, he would then seek to postpone the Writ for another week, until he was able to get those notes and consider the evidence, that evidence, be it remembered, which had already been considered by two Judges in Ireland, but which the hon. Member wished to see, in order to ascertain whether he might not find an excuse for differing with the Report of those Judges. They had reported that there was no corrupt practice proved on either side save this—that an agent of whom the sitting Member knew nothing, without his knowledge, gave a man a small sum of money to abstain from voting. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL said, there was nothing of that in the Judge's Report.] With great respect to the hon. Member, he could assure him that if he took the trouble of reading the certificate of the learned Judges he would find that they so stated. The result of the inquiry was that out of the whole borough one man was found to have taken a bribe without the sitting Member's knowledge, whilst the Judges certified that they had no reason to believe—and as they heard the evidence he (the Attorney General for Ireland) submitted they were quite as capable of considering it as the hon. Member—that corrupt practices extensively prevailed. The hon. Member wanted this Writ to be postponed for an indefinite period, and that, in the meantime, the electors should be deprived of their Constitutional rights. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) protested against the proposal, and trusted that it would not be accepted by the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown (Ireland) to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Dungannon, in the room of Thomas Alexander Dickson, esquire, whose Election hath been determined to be void.

EARLDOM OF MAR—THE RESOLUTION.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I wish to put to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to know, Whether any intimation had been made to the Lord Clerk Register, in accordance with the Resolution adopted by the House, relative to the Earl of Mar Peerage, on the 14th instant?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I believe no intimation has been made, and that none properly can be made, to the Lord Clerk Register with regard to this Resolution. The Resolution adopted by the House was—"It is incumbent on the House to rescind their Order of the 26th February, 1875." Before the House can rescind that Order there must be a Motion and a vote to do so. There has been no such vote passed; and if any noble Lord should propose one, I must assume that he would come prepared to recommend to the House the adoption of what he may consider a more proper form of Order to be substituted for that which has been made. The Order that was made was consequential on a judicial act of the House, founded on a Report of the Committee of Privileges; and if that is rescinded, beyond all question some other must be made. I hope that anyone who moves such Order will consider whether it shall be in a form which will put on the Union Roll of Scotland two Earldoms of Mar, or in a form which, leaving only one Earldom of Mar, will change its precedence, and whether there are not objections of the gravest character to either of those courses.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: My Lords, I gave Notice—a full fortnight's Notice—of my intention to move that the Order be rescinded, and that was fully debated on Monday last. I had originally put down "and it is hereby rescinded;" but I afterwards thought that would be rather offensive in form, and I considered that if the House adopted the Resolution saying that it was "incumbent on them to rescind the Order," that was virtually the same as saying they intended to rescind it; and, therefore, I still hold that the division that took place a week ago was, to all intents and purposes, a decision of the House that the Order should be rescinded. Of course, after what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, all I can do is to give Notice that on the first available day I shall move that due effect be given to the Motion of Monday last, the 14th instant, which stands already officially recorded on the Journals of the House as having been resolved in the affirmative.

SOUTH AFRICA—DISARMAMENT OF THE BASUTOS.—QUESTION.

EARL CADOGAN wished to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question, of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether Her Majesty's Government had received an official confirmation of the telegram which appeared in The Times of that morning, stating that the Basuto Chief had agreed to the disarmament of the Tribes, and had offered to surrender his own arms; and, whether an order had been issued directing that all those having arms in their possession should surrender them after a certain extension of time?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, that a confirmation of the telegram in The Times had been received at the Colonial Office. It was in these terms:—

"Sir B. Frere to Secretary of State.

"Received June 21, 1880.

"19th.—Letsea accepts decision of Her Majesty's Government regarding disarmament as final. Orders all his people to surrender arms; will surrender his own. Asks extension of time for voluntary surrender, which has been granted."

DOMESTIC SERVITUDE IN HONG KONG—THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE, 1867.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the differences of opinion between the Attorney General and the Governor of Hong Kong, and between the Attorney General and the Chief Justice of Hong Kong, as to the purchase and detention of children and so-called domestic servitude in Hong Kong; and to the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Governor of Hong Kong to inquire into the working of the Contagious Diseases Ordinance of 1867, said: In calling your Lordships' attention to this subject, I shall not have occasion to remark upon anything more unsavoury than the con-

DOMESTIC SERVITUDE IN HONG KONG—THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE, 1867.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the differences of opinion between the Attorney General and the Governor of Hong Kong, and between the Attorney General and the Chief Justice of Hong Kong, as to the purchase and detention of children and so-called domestic servitude in Hong Kong; and to the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Governor of Hong Kong to inquire into the working of the Contagious Diseases Ordinance of 1867, said: In calling your Lordships' attention to this subject, I shall not have occasion to remark upon anything more unsavoury than the conduct of some of the police and officials, of Hong Kong. I am going to confine myself to the treatment of the Chinese, and to complain of the conduct of some police officials, and I shall ask the Secretary of State to support the Report of Mr. Pope Hennessy's Commissioners. The Papers to which I ask attention are Reports of Commissioners appointed by the Governor of Hong Kong in November, 1877, to inquire into the working of the Contagious Diseases Ordinances. I am glad of this opportunity of testifying to the good service rendered in this matter by the Governor, Mr. Pope Hennessy, since the colonial newspapers have lately attacked him for disturbing that Colony; and if the other matters which he has disturbed, and for which he has been complained of, are like the abuses reported in these Papers, he is deserving of the highest praise. This Report has been laid before the other House on a Motion of Mr. Stansfeld. That right hon. Gentleman is the strongest opponent of the Acts in question; hitherto I have been in favour of them; but these Acts will become impossible if they are to be accompanied by the tyranny and official corruption set forth in this Report; a tyranny which has for its object to increase the Revenue, and not the sanitary objects which could alone justify the passing of these Acts and Ordinances. The Report states (p. 16) that it was shown—

“That revenue would be derived from the tainted sources of prostitution amongst the Chinese, while it had been decided not to enforce against the houses for the Chinese only those sanitary clauses of the Ordinance which formed its only raison d'être.”

This statement of the Report is confirmed by the large sum mentioned—$111,149 profit—which has accrued to the Colonial Treasury from this source from 1857 to 1877. It is this raising of revenue, of licensing and of recognizing as a condition or profession, which is demoralizing, and which has made this system so hateful in France. When Vespasian replied to the remonstrances of his more scrupulous and sensitive son, Non olet nummus he referred to material, not to moral taint. The raising of revenue, moreover, always brings with it the use of informers and spies. These, again, are most hateful in France, and if resorted to in this country the Acts would not be tolerated any longer. But at Hong Kong spies and informers have flourished beyond anything known elsewhere. Some of the Metropolitan Police have been drafted off to Hong Kong to assist in the pursuit of unfortunate women, and higher officials appear to have joined in the chase, as a pastime apparently. Such is the terror inspired by these informers that in 1877 two women in trying to escape from them fell over the roofs of their houses, and were killed outright. The inquest on them gave rise to this inquiry. In other years several women risked their lives by escaping through windows from the inspectors, and several were severely injured by falls. It is the practice of these informers to offer marked dollars to Chinese women, and if accepted to prosecute them; though the Report states that there is—

“Most serious suspicion whether the money was not placed by the informers where the inspector could find it, or that it was not given for the purposes subsequently deposed to.”

The Report also states that in 1861 the acting Registrar General personally acted as detective, and secured a conviction by means of a European constable. In the following year a woman was fined by the action, as informers and detectives, of the Inspector, a policeman, and the bailiff of the Supreme Court. This bailiff of the Supreme Court had received a diamond ring from this woman, so that he must have been guilty either of having received a bribe, or else, what is worse, of having betrayed a woman to whom he was indebted. It is not clear on what grounds the woman was fined, as the usual order of things was reversed in this case, as she had given instead of receiving the diamond ring, and the Report does not state in whose possession the diamond ring remained eventually, though it complains of the police for illegally depriving the women of money which had been given to them. Such is the haphazard way of proceeding of these informers, and so much do they invade, and break into private houses, that in 1872 and 1874 the Inspectors arrested three girls; subsequently it was proved conclusively that they were immaculate and innocent, and had never been otherwise; perhaps the police might set up the defence that they might have become otherwise later on. I would ask whether Inspectors Horton and Whitehead, who figured in these affairs, had belonged to the Metropolitan Police? The Report dwells at length on the great difference between the Chinese houses and those used by Europeans, and on the fact that the Chinese houses are not dealt with from a sanitary point of view, and it recommends that they should continue to be let alone, and therefore not be subjected to taxation. But, it is said, it is in the interest of philanthropy that these Chinese houses should be licensed, for the sake of protection of Chinese women and children. No such protection, however, has been afforded by the police, and the Attorney General refused to extend his protection, when it was required, and had been called for by the Governor of Hong Kong. A Chinaman, under stress of poverty, had sold his daughter, aged six years, to another Chinese, in October, 1877; in 1878 he claimed her back, having reason to fear that the purchaser was going to sell her and ship her away to another port. The father petitioned the Governor for the restoration of his child, the purchaser also petitioned him against being deprived of the child. The Governor called the attention of the Attorney General to what appeared to him to be an illegal transaction. The Attorney General denied that there was any illegality May 31. The Governor, June 19, 19 days later, desired the Attorney General to prosecute the purchaser of the girl on his behalf. This the Attorney General declined to do; after that there was more correspondence between the Governor and the Attorney General. A Chinese society for the protection of women and children was organized under the auspices of two police magistrates and Dr. Eitel, at the instigation of the Governor. Mr. Pope Hennessy has taken the right method of dealing with the Chinese, in instituting this society, and in asking for the co-operation of the leading Chinamen. The Spaniards in Manilla have found it answer very well to give some authority and a staff of office to Chinese headmen; and if this method were adopted at Singapore and Penang, similar good results would follow. Meantime, the Chief Justice (Sir John Smale) came into action and delivered a judgment from the Bench of the Supreme Court against the whole practice of the Chinese of purchasing either male or female children, and stated that there were 10,000 slaves in Hong Kong; and that all slavery—domestic, agrarian, or for immoral purposes—comes within one and the same category. He also inflicted some very heavy sentences of 18 months with hard labour on two women for detaining a boy of 13. The Chief Justice also expressed his wish for the committal to trial, and for the opportunity of sentencing a druggist who had bought an orphan boy for $17½, who had remained with him as his servant about 20 days. The Chinese Committee, members and leading merchants, then presented a Petition, which very ably stated all the facts of a subject which has been looked upon with such different eyes by the Attorney General and the Chief Justice, and Dr. Eitel made an equally able Report upon this Petition. Now, there can be little doubt that the Attorney General was wrong in his British law, and wrong in declining to carry out the Minute of the Governor. The Attorney General ought to air his Habeas Corpus more frequently; Habeas Corpus is often referred to in the Correspondence, and that instrument ought to have been used; in this case, in which the Governor called upon him to act, the purchaser of the girl was about to commit a breach of Chinese law and custom if he was going to send away the child from his house. Every Chinese woman or child in Hong Kong ought to be able to cling to the skirts of the Attorney General and find safety under British law. If that were so, and with the help of the Society instituted by Mr. Pope Hennessy, the degrading protection of the Licensing Ordinance, even if such protection existed, would be unnecessary. On the other hand, the Chief Justice, I regret to say, has rushed into wild exaggeration. If his judgment were to be carried out, he would be separating many married couples, and dissolving what are after all apprenticeships, which are beneficial to all parties. I have been authorized by responsible persons in the Chinese Embassy in London to state that the Chinese custom of purchasing children is most beneficial to humanity, and that it is the great check on infanticide, especially female infanticide. That which I heard at the Chinese Embassy is set out in the Petition of the Chinese of Hong Kong, and in Dr. Eitel's Report. I must say that Hong Kong is to be congratulated on the possession of Dr. Eitel. I know nothing more of him than what I find in the official Papers. He is a man of enlarged mind, well acquainted with Chinese customs, and desirous of acting in harmony with them, and of improving them where possible; and I entreat the Secretary of State for the Colonies to give the utmost attention to his recommendations. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the production of the Correspondence and Papers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY regretted that the Correspondence on the subjects referred to was not yet complete, and therefore could not be produced. The questions which the noble Lord had raised were questions of considerable interest and difficulty. It was the practice throughout China and in Hong Kong to purchase children for adoption. That was to say, children were adopted into a family, and a sum of money was paid on the occasion to the parents. The Chief Justice of Hong Kong had expressed himself very strongly against those practices; but he had done so extra-judicially. He said that both domestic servitude and the purchase of children for the purpose of adoption were contrary to the English laws against slavery and the Slave Trade. The Governor of the Colony took the matter into consideration, and required the Attorney General to institute a prosecution in a case where a father wished to get back an adopted child. The Attorney General, however, differed in opinion from both the Governor and the Chief Justice. Writing on May 1, 1878, he said—

"The transaction referred to could not be recognized by our law as giving any rights, except, perhaps, those of guardianship; but I am unable to say there is anything illegal in the matter. I do not think it is a criminal offence if it goes no further than the adoption of the child, and the payment of money."

The acting Attorney General had since given a similar opinion, and the point being one of great difficulty, he (the Earl of Kimberley) had written to the Governor, requesting him to communicate with the Chief Justice, and ask for the grounds of his opinion; but, as they had not yet been received, he was not prepared to state what course Her Majesty's Government would adopt. At the same time, he thought it right to say that if those institutions had existed from time immemorial among the Chinese, he thought Her Majesty's Government ought to be careful not to confound the institutions and practices of that people with our own. If they were told that those were institutions closely interwoven with Chinese life and habits, it might be difficult to interfere; but if there were at Hong Kong any practices which were contrary to our laws against slavery, those laws would be enforced. Their Lordships would see, however, that before taking any action in the matter it was necessary to ascertain what the facts really were. As to the other branch of the noble Lord's subject—that referring to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Ordinance of 1867—he was able to exonerate the police entirely. He could not enter into the details of the Report from the nature of the subject. There had, however, been some revolting practices arising from the employment of informers, which was now stopped. To prevent the kidnapping of girls an offer had been made by some Chinese gentlemen to form themselves into a society to put it down, and of this he entirely approved. The whole question would require the most careful consideration of the Government. He was not at present in a position to produce any further Papers on the subjects of his noble Friend's inquiry.

NAVY—THE BREAKWATER AT ALDERNEY.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in putting a Question to the Government on the condition of the breakwater in Alderney, stated that he understood the end of the breakwater had been washed away, and had created a dangerous shoal at the mouth of the harbour, on which some vessels had been wrecked. He did not ask the Government to repair the breakwater, or even to remove the shoal; but only to fix a buoy on the shoal, in order to warn vessels of the danger of the navigation.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in reply, said, that in January, 1879, a portion of the breakwater at Alderney gave way. Notice was given at once to mariners as to the danger caused by the breach, and inquiry was made whether AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD VENTRY moved for a Return showing the number of Agricultural Holdings in each Poor Law Union scheduled under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, valued at under £4; £4 and not exceeding £10; £10 and not exceeding £15; £15 and not exceeding £20. The noble Lord said, it was rumoured that legislation of a rather unprecedented character might shortly be proposed to their Lordships; and he believed that the contemplated measure would be limited to the Unions scheduled under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, and would thus affect the occupiers of the holdings described in his Question. The Return, therefore, if made, would give the number of those likely to be so affected. He, however, with the assent of the Government, would extend it by including holdings exceeding £20 and not exceeding £50.

EARL SPENCER said, he had no objection to granting the Return in the amended form proposed by the noble Lord.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Return showing the number of Agricultural Holdings in each Poor Law Union scheduled under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, valued at under £4; £4 and not exceeding £10; £10 and not exceeding £15; £15 and not exceeding £20; £20 and not exceeding £50.—(The Lord Ventry.)

Ordered to be laid before the House.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE IRISH SPRING ASSIZES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asked the Lord President of the Council to name the seven counties in Ireland which the Judges of the Spring Assizes declared to be in a bad or exceedingly bad state.

EARL SPENCER said, he wished in regard to this Question to make an explanation. The noble Earl asked him to name the counties which the Judges had declared to be bad. It was quite true that in the reports which appeared upon the occasion referred to these words were put into his mouth, and he could not absolutely say whether he used them or not; but what he intended to say was that he considered the Judges' Charges, which referred to the seven counties in question, declared them to be in a bad state. It was his opinion, and not that of the Judges. He had no objection to give the names of those counties which, in his opinion, were bad—namely, Cavan, Clare, Galway, Leitrim, Limerick, Mayo, and Sligo.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND.)

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved for a Return of the number of unskilled labourers employed during the week ending the 12th of June by landlords or sanitary authorities, or on works undertaken by baronial sessions, in the scheduled districts in Ireland under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880. The noble Earl said the Motion would appear to be of an inquisitorial kind; but the most grossly erroneous statements had been made with regard to landlords in Ireland, not only upon this subject but upon every other. But these wicked and false statements had never before been supported by facts and figures. He alluded particularly to a resolution come to by what he considered a semi-official body—namely, the Dublin Mansion House Relief Committee, which resolution was forwarded to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It referred to the number of men employed on the relief works started by the late and confirmed by the present Government, and stated that the net result of the borrowing of £1,500,000, out of which £250,000 had been issued, was that 15,000 men only were employed out of a starving population of 358,000. This was a most serious matter, because he frankly admitted that if that statement was true the action of the late Government was entirely mistaken in making advances in the first instance by an Order in Council, and, in the second place, coming to Parliament for authority to make advances. He very much feared that if that were the case it was equally wrong of the present Government to extend such a system of relief. But he believed that the statement was entirely calumnious, as were also certain statements that had been made in the other House of Parliament. He had only just received a telegram from a well-known gentleman in Ireland, who was only doing what many others

Local Government Board saw no objection to the proposal of the noble Earl, believing, as they did, that a great deal of valuable evidence would be collected by the Committee. The Acts in question were manifestly incomplete. He hoped that one result would be that some consolidating Act would be brought forward, and trusted that if their Lordships assented to the proposal of the noble Earl, he would give the Committee the benefit of his ability and knowledge in assisting at their deliberations. Since the passing of the former Acts, the highway and sanitary districts had been made coterminous; but the new system had not been in operation long enough to enable the Committee to make their inquiry complete this year; therefore, he would suggest that the labours of the Committee should be continued next Session, and then they would be able to learn how the Act of 1878 had worked, especially with respect to the financial burdens upon the ratepayers in different parts of the Kingdom.

Motion agreed to.

And, on July 2, the Lords following were named of the Committee:

Ld. Steward.	L. Strafford.
E. Hardwicke.	L. Leigh.
E. De La Warr.	L. Aberdare.
E. Fortescue.	L. Cottesloe.
L. Clinton.	L. Shute.
L. Meldrum.

The Committee to appoint their own Chairman.

And, on July 9, E. Onslow added.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER (NATAL).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BRABOURNE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether a Bill legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister, received in 1878 from the Colony of Natal, was or was not carried only by the Speaker's casting vote in the Legislature of that Colony, such having been the grounds stated by the then Secretary of State for the Colonies for declining to advise Her Majesty to sanction the measure; and whether a similar Bill has since been passed by the Legislature of Natal, and, if so, whether it has received the Royal Assent? The noble Lord explained that he had occasion to ask a Question in 1878 in "another place" upon this subject, and was told by the late Secretary of State for the Colonies that the Bill was opposed by increasing minorities in the Natal Colony, and was only carried by the casting vote of the Speaker, and therefore he declined to advise Her Majesty to sanction the measure; but the information which Sir Michael Hicks-Beach received turned out to be incorrect. The Bill was, in fact, passed by considerable majorities, and he would now be glad to hear what course the Government would pursue.

EARL CADOGAN wished, before the Secretary of State for the Colonies replied to the Question, to explain that Sir Michael Hicks-Beach did state that the first Bill referred to was passed only by the casting vote of the Speaker, but subsequently learnt that that was an error, the fact being that it was carried by a majority of 6 or 7. The smallness of the majority was not the only reason for not advising Her Majesty to sanction the Bill, but also because it was felt that a different law of marriage ought not to be introduced in Natal from that which prevailed in the other South African Colonies before the question of Confederation was settled.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY observed, that his answer to the Question had been, in a great measure, anticipated by the noble Earl who had just sat down. The first Bill referred to in the Question was rejected on the ground stated by the noble Earl. A second Bill, which was carried by a majority of 14 to 4, had been in this country for a year, and unless action was taken with regard to it the Bill would lapse, as the former one had done. This was not an ordinary case. It had been determined not to object to the laws which had been passed for legalizing these marriages in some of the Colonies; but the question as regarded Natal was peculiar. The marriage law was one of the subjects specially reserved for the Federal Parliament in the event of Confederation; and, therefore, at the moment when Confederation was under discussion in South Africa, he did not think it desirable that this Natal Bill should be sanctioned. If Confederation should not be adopted or should be indefinitely postponed, the matter would have to be again taken into consideration.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—

THE ATTACK ON MR. ACHESON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asked Her Majesty's Government whether they intend to send down an additional force of constabulary to protect Mr. Acheson and his property; and, whether in such an event the expense will be charged upon the district? He (the Earl of Leitrim) had protested against the non-renewal of the Peace Preservation Act; but as it been allowed to expire, his only wish was that the Government might succeed, under the ordinary law, in preserving that order and peace which they in Ireland so much desired, but which, alas! they knew so little of. Electricity must daily and nightly convey to Her Majesty's Government the news of the continual outrages which were occurring in that country; and it must, he thought, make them doubt whether, after all, their scheme of dealing with the grave situation in Ireland was the right one. He could only imagine that when the Cabinet met in Council, and when that happy circle was complete, they must receive such severe shocks and starts as could only be figuratively, though not lightly, compared with the shocks and starts of a galvanic battery worked by Mr. Parnell. The case of Mr. Acheson was this. The late Mr. Acheson, in the spring of 1879, evicted a tenant of 2½ acres of land because he owed three years' rent. That was not a harsh or capricious proceeding. The late Mr. Acheson was succeeded in that property by his youngest son, who was about 21 years of age, and he proceeded to exercise his undoubted right to fence round the land. He was met by a party of men with blackened faces, fired upon, and obliged to retreat. On the second attempt, though guarded by 13 of the Royal Irish Constabulary, about 1,400 people gathered on the hills in the neighbourhood, apparently in response to gun signals, and swept down on the party. Mr. Acheson, having been hunted well-nigh to death, in self-defence turned upon his pursuers, and warned them that if they advanced he would fire. One of those people, more foolhardy than the rest, pursued that unfortunate young man, in spite of repeated warnings, when Mr. Acheson fired and the victim fell. He would not attempt to prejudge that case; but it illustrated the unhappy state of that particular district. Their Lordships had had an assurance in the Queen's Speech that the Government would take such precautions as would give security to life and property in Ireland. He was confident that the Government had the best intentions in that matter; but he asked for a statement from them that would satisfy the House and the country that life and property would be secure, and that this persecution of landlords—he would call it by no other name—was not to be continued, and that they were not to be stoned like the Apostles of old in that cruel and ungrateful manner. He warned the Government that if, by weakness, they alienated the sympathies of the respectable, the good, and the true on the other side of the water, they would have so much fat in the fire that they would never again know what was a peaceable and loyal Ireland.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK wished, before the Lord President rose to answer that Question, also to inquire whether he had received information of a serious collision between a large number of Militiamen and the body of police who were protecting Mr. Acheson on his way from the court?

EARL SPENCER: I am unable to answer the Question put by the noble Earl who spoke last. I have had no Notice of his intention to ask it, and no facts have come to my knowledge on the subject. With regard to the Question of the noble Earl who spoke first, I have to say that it is the intention of the Government to give personal protection to Mr. Acheson and also to protect him in his property. It is believed that the ordinary county police will be sufficient for the purpose; but, if not, the Government will send a force from the Reserve, and a moiety of the expense will be charged on the district.

LORD HARLECH hoped the expense would be put on a restricted area so as to make it felt, and not on those parts of the district which were known to be orderly and loyal.

EARL SPENCER: I am sorry that I cannot answer my noble Friend on that point. No inquiry has been made as to the exact area of the district; but if the noble Lord wishes to have information in that form I will endeavour to obtain it.

of his class were doing, to say that he was this week employing 1,200 men, and last week 1,000. These works had been going on since last October, before the Government offered any loans at all. He knew that the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne), and the noble Earl (the Earl of Kenmare), and many others, had been employing workmen by hundreds during the distress. He himself had employed 845 men in Donegal, as well as some on a smaller estate in Leitrim. He had had to borrow the money and go into debt to carry out those works; and in one case, where 241 men were employed, he was assured beforehand that the work could never repay the outlay. Nevertheless, he had felt bound to carry it out, because the place swarmed with people like a beehive or a rabbit warren. It had been alleged in "another place" that although £250,000 had been granted in loans to landlords, little of that money had reached the people actually distressed; but he could say that in his own case, and in the case of other landlords who had been loyally supporting the efforts of the Government to deal with the sad state of affairs, they had been spending the money on works before they could really get the loans from the Board of Works; and he was sorry to see that the Government, having encouraged the landowners to incur these responsibilities, seemed now to be favouring legislation which would subject them to such inconveniences that they would never be able to meet their engagements.

Moved, That there be laid before this House, Return of the number of unskilled labourers employed during the week ending the 12th of June by landlords or sanitary authorities, or on works undertaken by baronial sessions, in the scheduled districts in Ireland under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880.—(The Earl of Leitrim.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE wished to point out that it was impossible at this time of the year to carry on any of these works, as all the able-bodied men were in England. Many drains would remain unfinished until after the harvest; and, therefore, it would be hard to require that payments made after July should bear a higher rate. He bore testimony to the conduct of Irish landlords in their endeavours to relieve the distress, many of them having spent three times the amount

they had received from the Board of Works.

EARL SPENCER said, he was unable to follow the noble Earl in some of the observations which he had addressed to the House. He was not aware what passed at the Dublin Mansion House. It seemed that some statements were made there underrating the amount of work done by landlords in Ireland. He was not aware of what passed in the House of Commons on this subject. It was unusual to refer to the proceedings of the other House, and he felt the inconvenience at that moment of the references of the noble Earl. He was unable to answer the Question as to the higher rate after July; but he was glad to recognize the patriotism and public spirit of many noble Lords and others with regard to the present distress. Many landlords had expended very large sums on improvements in order to meet the distress; and he was sure everybody must appreciate the public spirit with which they were actuated. With regard to the Return asked for, he thought it would be difficult, almost impossible, for the Government to obtain the information referred to in the first part of that Return. How were the Government to obtain a Return from the landlords of the number of people employed by them? With regard to the other part of the Return, he was afraid also he must refuse it. At the present moment there was such a pressure on the Departments in Ireland that there was not any time to spare. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had ordered a Return to be prepared of the number of persons employed on the different kinds of relief works, and when that was obtained he thought his noble Friend's Question would be practically answered.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM, in withdrawing the Motion, said, his only object in placing it on the Paper was to call attention to the misstatements which had been made. He must be allowed to express his surprise that the noble Earl knew nothing of a semi-official document issued by the Mansion House Committee and forwarded to the Chief Secretary.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Withdrawn—Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday* [146].

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and Mr. Justice Grove, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Election Petitions, a Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Stroud.

Court of Common Pleas, Westminster, 21st June 1880.

Sir,

We have the honour to report to you that the Petition against the Return for the Borough of Stroud has been withdrawn by leave of the Court. We have the honour further to report that the withdrawal of the Petition was not in our opinion the result of any corrupt arrangement or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other Petition.

We have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient humble servants,

COLERIDGE,

Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Judge of the Common Pleas.

The Right Honble.

The Speaker, House of Commons, M.P.

And the said Report was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

THE LAND AND THE GAME LAWS— LEGISLATION.

MR. WAUGH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the recommendations of a Select Committee of this House in the year 1851, and with a view to the simplification of the transfer of land and of the Game Laws, he will be prepared in this or the next Session of Parliament to bring in a Bill to abolish copyhold, customary, and other similar tenures in land, providing for compensation for the lords' rights therein. He further asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to bring in a Bill to extinguish, with compensation, all rights of free chase and free warren, and other sporting rights over lands not the property of the owners of such rights, and to attach all rights of game and sporting to the ownership of the soil, and connect them therewith inseparably for the benefit of the landowner and his tenant; and, also, whether directions will be given to the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, on all future inclosures, to disallow any reservation of game and rights of sporting over lands to be enclosed under the authority of the Commons Inclosure Acts?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that when the whole question of the transfer of land came under review the propriety of abolishing copyhold, customary, and other similar tenure land, and for providing compensation for the lords' rights would be considered; but he could not at present fix the date when such a measure would be introduced. He had already expressed his opinion as to the mischief of severing the game rights both from the proprietorship and the occupation of the land, and in this case also he was unable to say when it would be possible to deal with the question. He had no power to direct the Inclosure Commissioners in future inclosures to disallow any reservation of game and rights of sporting over lands to be inclosed; but the Inclosure Commissioners informed him that they did not now sanction such reservation in regard to any land capable of being made arable. In certain cases they had allowed a concurrent right between the lords of the manor and the common right owners.

CRIMINAL LAW — SENTENCES FOR AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to several cases of aggravated assaults in the last year for which sentences of six months and under were awarded; and, if these cases were all tried under the same statute as the case of John O'Shea, of Limerick, who got five years' penal servitude last December for an assault on Lord Fermoy, although Lord Fermoy did not receive the slightest bodily harm?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, in answer to the first part of the Question, I have to say that my attention has not been particularly called to several cases of aggravated assaults within the last year, where sentences of six months and under were awarded. I do not know whether the hon. Member refers to England or Ireland; but if he means English cases, they have not been brought under my notice; and if he means Irish cases, my attention would not, of course, be called to them. No criminal cases in Ireland come under the jurisdiction or consideration of the Home Office. Therefore, if the hon. Member thinks there are grounds for an application for the remission of the sentence in the case he refers to, that application should be made to the Irish Government, for the Home Office never considers the revision of sentences in respect of Irish cases.

PRISONS ACT—INSPECTION OF CONVICT PRISONS.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps, if any, have been taken to give effect to the strong recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Penal Servitude Acts: First, That there should be an independent inspection of convict prisons by persons appointed by the Government but unconnected with the Convict Prison Department and unpaid; and, Secondly, That the prison at Spike Island be discontinued?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the discontinuance of the prison at Spike Island is under consideration, and I cannot, consequently, state what will be the decision of the Government with regard to the recommendations of the Commission. The late Government, I find, did not see their way to give effect to them. I agree very much, as far as I am able to go into the question, with the objects aimed at; but there are difficulties in finding a proper person to make the inspection. The English system, as my hon. Friend is doubtless aware, is to appoint a chairman or deputy-chairman of Quarter Sessions to the office; but in Ireland the chairmen of the Quarter Sessions are Crown officials and would not come under the description suggested by the Committee.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Sir, in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that on an early day I shall move for a Committee to inquire into the subject.

THE ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will place upon the Table of the House the Reports of the two Committees appointed to inquire into the management and financial arrangements connected with the Royal Patriotic Fund Schools at Wandsworth, together with a Copy of the whole of the accounts of the Patriotic Fund, as recommended by the latter Committee?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the Reports of the Committees to which he refers have not yet come before me; but when they do, I will consider whether they can properly be laid on the Table.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS gave Notice that, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's reply, he would on an early day move for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the whole question of the Patriotic Fund.

NEW STREETS (METROPOLIS).

MR. GREGORY asked the honourable Baronet the Member for Truro, What progress has been made by the Metropolitan Board of Works in the construction of the new streets from Charing Cross to Tottenham Court Road, and the Regent Circus to New Oxford Street respectively, or in the acquisition of the property required for the same; and, whether there are any and what special reasons for the delay which has already taken place or any obstacles in the way of proceeding with communications which are so much needed between the north and south of the Metropolis?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL HOGG: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to inform him that the progress of the two improvements referred to has been delayed in consequence of the difficulty of dealing with the property occupied by the labouring classes; but, where not so occupied, a considerable amount of property has been acquired for the street from Piccadilly to New Oxford Street. By the terms of the Act of Parliament, not more than 15 houses occupied by persons of the labouring class can be removed until sufficient accommodation in suitable dwellings has been acquired elsewhere for the numbers displaced. Consequently, if the Board proceeded to acquire property so occupied, possession could not be taken until the requisite accommodation had been provided. I may add that, although under the Act the Board has power to acquire sites by agreement, it has no authority to erect labourers' dwellings, and building companies or societies have evinced no alacrity to take lands for such a purpose. Perhaps the House will allow me to mention that 12 street improvements were included in the Act of 1877, of which two—namely, those at Mare Street, Hackney, and the Angel, Islington have been completed; eight others are in a more or less advanced stage, and, in several cases, including that of Coventry Street widening, the Board anticipates that the ground will be cleared before the end of the summer.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT— STANDARD WEIGHTS.

MR. H. FOWLER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, having regard to the great inconvenience caused to the iron trade by the highest standard weight now legalised being 56 pounds, he would cause a new denomination of standard weight equal to 112 pounds, or one hundredweight, to be made and duly verified, in accordance with the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, there is a great objection to multiplying legal standards, owing to the cost thereby thrown upon local authorities, who have to obtain copies, and there would also be some inconvenience in having another standard of so nearly the same weight as the cental. In these circumstances the Board of Trade would not, I think, be justified in legalizing a weight of 112 pounds unless there was a general demand for it. At present there has been no such demand, there having been but one application during the last 12 months.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—WORKHOUSE CHAPLAINS.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Local Government Board have directed their attention to a Return of the salaries paid and allowances of every kind made to chaplains in workhouses in Ireland, from which Return it appears that the greatest inequality exists in the salaries paid to the Roman Catholic and Protestant chaplains respectively, to the undue advantage of Protestant chaplains, having regard to the number of paupers of each religious denomination and the amount of work performed by their respective chaplains; and, has the Local Government Board any intention of recommending Poor Law guardians to adopt some other method, either by a capitation grant or otherwise, that will remunerate more equitably chaplains of workhouses?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the Local Government Board have sent in the Return to which the hon. and gallant Member refers, and I am sorry to say I have not been able to give it as much consideration as I could wish. The principle on which the chaplains should be paid was laid down in the Eighth Order of the Poor Law Commissioners in 1842, and I found that since that there have been alterations; but I believe entirely in the increase of appointments of Catholic chaplains and not the decrease of Protestant chaplains. I do not know whether further cases of reduction are required or not, but I will inquire if it be so. With regard to the payment by capitation grant, I must remind my hon. and gallant Friend that if a service has to be performed it takes as much time to perform it for a small number as for a large one.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has as yet been able to give attention to the state of facts revealed by the Returns laid before the late Parliament on the subject of Protestant Chaplains in Irish Workhouses and Catholic Chaplains in English Workhouses; and, whether he intends to take any and what steps to remedy the striking contrasts thereby disclosed?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have not had time to examine the details given in the Report in question. The hon. and learned Member, however, is undoubtedly aware that there is no power in the Guardians in England to appoint Roman Catholic chaplains in workhouses. I may add that in several cases in which there have been considerable numbers of Roman Catholic paupers in a workhouse, and the Guardians have been willing to appoint and pay a Roman Catholic priest to give religious instruction, the Department has readily assented to the arrangement.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he will consider the advisability of assimilating the law in this respect in England to that which prevails in Ireland, where the Local Government Board has power to compel the appointment of chaplains for the paupers, irrespective of their religion?

MR. DODSON: I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to give me time to examine the Report.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY— ADMISSION TO CETEWAYO.

SIR. DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it was the fact that, down to the most recent dates from the Cape, the Zulu King has not been permitted to see his personal friends, who understand his language, and could learn from him what he may have to say on his own behalf; and whether, in particular, permission to visit Cetewayo has been refused by Sir Bartle Frere to the sons of Bishop Colenso on two separate occasions; and, whether he can state the reasons for refusing such permission, and will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence, telegraphic or other, which has recently taken place between the Colonial Office and the South African authorities as to the treatment of the imprisoned chiefs Cetewayo and Langalibalele?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend's first Question, I have to state that I cannot answer generally with respect to Cetewayo's personal friends, because I have not the information to enable me to do so; but it is perfectly true that permission was refused—and Her Majesty's Government think, unfortunately, refused—to two members of Bishop Colenso's family who wished to see Cetewayo. With regard to that matter the Secretary of State has telegraphed out to the Cape to say that they think the reasons given were not sufficient for not allowing Bishop Colenso's sons to see Cetewayo, and that they desire that in future all persons who wish to have access to the King should be admitted, unless it should be considered distinctly unsafe. With reference to the last part of the Question, I have to say that there will be no objection to laying the Correspondence on the Table as soon as it is completed. At present it is very imperfect, and we know that an exceedingly important despatch is on its way to us.

SIR HENRY TYLER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will add to his answer by telling us what is the number of wives allowed to Cetewayo?

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT —FINES FOR OUTRAGES.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether it is a fact that a fine of one hundred and fifty pounds sterling was laid, under the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, on the parish of Kidglass, in the county of Roscommon, in consequence of an assault; whether one hundred pounds of said fine were levied on the townland of Lavagh, in the parish of Kidglass, and whether that sum constitutes a tax of seven shillings and sixpence in the pound on the total valuation of said townland; whether it is a fact that ninety per cent. of the tenantry on the townland of Lavagh are in such distress that they are in receipt of relief from the Stokestown board of guardians and local relief committees; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, in view of the distressed condition of the tenantry on the townland of Lavagh, will take steps to prevent the enforcement of this fine under the operation of a Law they have not thought proper to renew?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I find on inquiry it is the fact that a fine of £150 was laid by the Grand Jury of Roscommon on this parish for an offence committed by some persons unknown. It is also a fact that £100 was ordered to be levied on the townland of Lavagh. That amount is equivalent to a tax of 3s. 8½d. in the pound half-yearly. I have reason to believe there are 21 families in the townland of Lavagh, all of whom, with the exception of four, are in receipt of relief, and of these four one was looking for it. The Government, though they have not thought fit to renew the Peace Preservation Act, cannot remit a fine legally inflicted; but that Act has not been renewed, partly on account of the hardship caused by the payment of fines in poor districts.

THE SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the scheme by the Treasury for the readjustment of the salaries of the commissioned clerks in the Sasine Office, Edinburgh, will be ready to come into operation; and what is the reason of the delay?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I have communicated with the Lord Advocate upon the subject, and he informs me that since the present Government came into Office the consideration of the departmental arrangements of the Register House has only been delayed until the new Deputy Clerk Register, appointed in April last, has had time to acquaint himself with the various questions involved, and to give the Government the benefit of his advice. Two gentlemen have been appointed from the Treasury and Home Office respectively to confer with the Deputy Clerk Register with a view to the immediate settlement of the question.

ARMY—INDIA—INDIAN SERVICE PENSIONS.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he proposes to assimilate the pensions of officers, especially field officers, of the Indian Staff Corps to those enjoyed by officers formerly in the Indian Service, but now in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers and in the new Line regiments of Infantry and Cavalry?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that as far as he was able to ascertain there never had been any proposal to assimilate the pensions mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member, and there was no present intention of doing so. If the hon. Member referred to any other case which had not come under his notice, he would be glad if he would communicate with him again.

INDIA—FINANCES, &c., OF INDIA

MR. COURTNEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended to require, from the Indian Government, the repayment, during the current financial year, of the quota of the sum of two millions advanced in 1879 upon condition of repayment in seven annual instalments?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this inquiry raises part of a very important question which Her Majesty's Government will have to consider. I believe I am correct in saying that the remission of the payment can only be effected by an Act of Parliament, which, of course, will bring the matter under the consideration of the House.

ARMY—RESERVE OF OFFICERS—WARRANT OF 6TH JULY, 1879.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the Secretary of State for War, What steps he intends to take to give effect to the Royal Warrant of the 6th July 1879, with regard to the Reserve of Officers; and how many have applied and are qualified to be appointed to the same?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply, to the hon. Member, I have to state that 251 officers who have retired from the Regular or Indian military forces otherwise than on pension or gratuity, and officers of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers who have applied for appointment to the Reserve of Officers and who are eligible in all respects, will shortly be gazetted to commissions in that Force; and 246 officers who, on account of their having retired from the Service on pension or gratuity, are liable for further service up to a certain age if called upon, will be included in the Reserve of Officers, but will not receive any fresh commissions. The total number of officers at present noted and found eligible for appointment to the Reserve of Officers is, therefore, about 500.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLES IX., XXXIII., XLII. — THE OTTOMAN DEBT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any arrangements have been made, under the provisions of Articles IX. XXXIII. and XLII. of the Treaty of Berlin, for the proportionate parts of the Ottoman Debt to be assumed by the Principalities of Bulgaria, Montenegro, and Servia; and, whether, in view of the annexation of Ottoman territory to Greece, the Conference now sitting at Berlin will take into consideration the assumption of any part of the Ottoman Debt by the Kingdom of Greece?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the arrangements contemplated in Articles IX., XXXIII., and XLII. of the Treaty of Berlin, have not yet been made. In the case of Bulgaria the amount of the tribute is to be fixed at the close of the first year of the working of the new Administration. This period will expire next month. In the case of Montenegro the Frontiers have not yet been settled. With regard to Servia nothing has been done. With regard to Greece, the duties of the Conference are restricted to the consideration of the Frontier question. The question to which the hon. Member calls attention would be a matter for subsequent arrangement in the preparation of any Treaty or other public act for carrying out the results of the Conference.

INDIA—THE ATTOCK BRIDGE.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can state what firms have been employed to make the ironwork for the bridge across the River Attock; if any of these firms were employed in a similar capacity for the ironwork on the Tay Bridge; and, what precautions are taken to insure that the ironwork for the Attock Bridge is, as far as can be ascertained, without flaw?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the firms employed to make the ironwork for the Attock Bridge are as follows:—For the girders—steel and wrought iron—Messrs. Westwood, Bailie, and Co., of London; for the piers—wrought iron—Messrs. Handyside and Co., of Derby. These firms were not, it is believed, in any way concerned in supplying ironwork for the Tay Bridge. All the materials of which the Attock bridgework is constructed are carefully tested, in accordance with a strict specification based on the most recent experience, by Government Inspectors. The bridge is being made of steel and wrought iron. No cast iron is employed.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ALBANIA.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government, before joining in any general action on the part of the European Powers to enforce, either diplomatically or otherwise, the cession of certain districts of Albania to Montenegro, will take steps to learn whether the Albanian inhabitants of the districts which it is proposed to cede are in favour of the cession?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I do not think I can add anything to the answer given on Friday by the First Lord of the Treasury to the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). Her Majesty's Government are engaged in negotiations with foreign Powers to further the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Berlin. While these negotiations continue it is not desirable to publish specific declarations. But it is the desire of Her Majesty's Government to carry out the spirit of that Treaty with the least amount of interference with the wishes of the inhabitants of the districts which may thereby be affected.

PETTY SESSIONS CLERKS (IRELAND).

MR. FINIGAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the magistrates assembled in Quarter Sessions held in Downpatrick, County Down, on April 1st, appointed as clerk of the Petty Sessions of Holwood and Bangor an avowed member of an Orange Lodge; whether a memorial was forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant, praying him not to confirm such appointment on the ground that it would destroy confidence in the local administration of justice; whether the Lord Lieutenant has declined to interfere, and, if so, on what grounds; and, whether the Government will not review the appointment in the interests of peace and order in this district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I find on inquiry that a person was appointed clerk of the Petty Sessions district of Holywood and Bangor, and a question as to whether he was an Orangeman or not appears to have been brought before the Court, and the reply was that he had not attended an Orange meeting as alleged, but a meeting in connection with an election in which he had acted as a paid clerk, under the direction of the chairman of the meeting. It was also stated that the fact was not established by any documents laid before the Government that this gentleman was an Orangeman. The Lord Lieutenant, I believe, was asked not to confirm this appointment, and he declined to interfere, on the ground that the election of clerk of Petty Sessions rested with the Justices, and that unless there was some legal disqualification, the Lord Lieutenant never refused his sanction. The Irish Government has no power—or, at any rate, it is a question whether it has any power—to review the appointment. I can only say I hope most heartily the magistrates at Petty Sessions in Ireland will not appoint avowed Orangemen or avowed partizans of any kind, and will make their appointments as free from political bias as possible.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

INDIA—OPIUM TRADE IN BRITISH BURMAH.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received Copies of a Petition presented by the Natives of British Burma to the Chief Commissioner, praying for the closing of the licensed opium shops, and of other documents relating to this subject, which are now under consideration of the Local Government of Burma; and whether he will print them and present them to Parliament?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, no copy of the Petition said to have been presented to the Chief Commissioner has been received, and no reference to such Petition can be traced in the proceedings of the Administration of British Burmah or of the Government of India. In the annual Revenue Report for British Burmah just received, I find that two Commissioners, of Aracan and of Pegu, refer to the great and injurious increase in the consumption of opium, and say that both the officials and the people themselves demand measures to check it. It appears, therefore, that the subject is receiving attention.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER ADMINISTRATIVE BATTALIONS.

MR. FORESTER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, looking at the fact that every administrative battalion of Volunteers has now been consolidated, and that the present Acts and Regulations refer almost entirely to administrative battalions, the Government intend to take any, and, if so, what steps to remodel the existing Acts and Regulations so as to adapt them to the new system?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the consolidation of the Volunteer Force is not quite completed; but when it is, the revision of the Volunteer Regulations will be at once taken up. The preliminary steps have been already taken.

THE PARKS—METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the arrest and prosecution of a delinquent aged exact nature of proceedings and decisions at the War Office, which, except those of the last few days, occurred before I became Secretary of State; but the main facts of the case are these. For some time past there have been great dissensions in the 4th East York Artillery Volunteers, which culminated in 1878 in a decision of my right hon. Predecessor, on a dispute between Colonel Humphrey and his adjutant, that the latter should be called upon to resign, and the former informed that the Secretary of State regretted that he could not consider it for the interest of the corps that he should be permitted to retain the command. On an appeal, my Predecessor decided in June, 1878, that Colonel Humphrey's resignation need not be enforced if a qualified adjutant were willing to accept that position under him; but that, if any further adverse report was received, his removal would be carried out. In May, 1879, a Court of Inquiry was assembled, on charges brought by Lieutenant Colonel Saner and three other officers against Colonel Humphrey. The Court reported that the charges were either unsupported or frivolous. On this, my Predecessor decided that Lieutenant Colonel Saner and the three officers should resign, and that Colonel Humphrey should be informed that it was desirable that he should withdraw from the command agreeably with the intention which he (Colonel Humphrey) had already expressed. Against this decision Colonel Saner appealed in September, 1879, and my Predecessor appears to have given long and serious attention to the question, and in January last decided that Colonel Saner's resignation might be held over till the 20th of March, in order that he might retain his rank, and that Colonel Humphrey must resign on the 31st of March. This decision my Predecessor expressly decided was irreversible. Colonel Humphrey, however, was allowed, by a decision arrived at before I took Office, to remain in command until the end of July; and, on an appeal to me some weeks ago, it was decided that the order for Colonel Humphrey's resignation could not be reversed. On Wednesday last it appears that a meeting of the corps was held in plain clothes, at which Colonel Humphrey notified his resignation, as well as that of Lord Londesborough, the Honorary Colonel of that corps and of the Hull Rifle Battalion, upon which the majority of the officers and nearly all the men withdrew from the corps. On the report of these proceedings reaching General Willis, who commands the Northern District, he instructed Colonel Collington, the District Inspector of Artillery Auxiliary Forces, to proceed to Hull and ascertain such facts as he could without delay. Colonel Collington examined the adjutant and three other officers, and I have to-day seen General Willis, who brought up Colonel Collington's Report. After perusing it, the Commander-in-Chief decided, with my approval, to send down at once General Elkington, the Deputy Adjutant General for Auxiliary Forces at the War Office, to assist General Willis in instituting a full inquiry on the spot into the proceedings of the 16th instant; and, meanwhile, the resignations of the 12 officers, their proceedings being prima facie insubordinate, have been refused and returned to them. On receiving General Willis and General Elkington's Report, it will be submitted to Her Majesty with the recommendations of the Commander-in-Chief.

IMPUTATIONS ON A MEMBER OF THIS HOUSE — GLOUCESTER ELECTION PETITION—(JUDGES' REPORT).

MR. MONK asked the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, to state to the House, Why he deferred for a whole week the Motion of which he gave Notice on Thursday last, "to call the attention of the House to the grave imputations upon a Member of this House?"

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, in reply, said, that he fixed the Question for a week after the day on which he gave Notice of it, because it occurred to him that the matter to which the Notice referred might be considered of a delicate and complicated nature, and that the hon. Member might wish to have a few days to collect the materials which he desired to submit to the House. Having given public Notice that he would bring the Question on upon a certain day, it was not in his power to alter the day for an earlier period. If he came down to the House and insisted on bringing on at once a Question of this kind, the hon. Member would have serious cause of complaint. In these circumstances, he would take that opportunity of asking Mr. Speaker whether, as the Motion partook of the nature of a Privilege question, it would take precedence of the Orders of the Day?

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock consulted me last week whether the Question which he has put on the Paper could be entertained as a question of Privilege. Since then I have had an opportunity of causing a search to be made for precedents, and I find that in some instances questions of this kind have been taken as questions of Privilege, and have had precedence. But I find that more frequently such questions have been dealt with as ordinary Motions. But it will on examination be found that, whenever such questions have been treated as Privilege, urgency has been of the essence of the Motion. I cannot say that this Motion now under consideration is of that urgent character that it should take precedence as Privilege.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to ask the Prime Minister, Whether, in view of the inconvenience of such a Motion remaining over, it would be in his power to allow it to take precedence of the Orders of the Day on Friday?

MR. MONK asked, Whether he might be allowed to appeal to his hon. Friends to allow this to be taken as an unopposed Motion?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was glad to hear that the terms of this Motion would be so arranged as to contain no words in any way reflecting on the character of his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). He believed the proposal made by his hon. Friend distinctly met the case; for when both the noble Lord and the hon. Member were in favour of taking it as an unopposed Motion, it might be taken as in no way disturbing the order of Business.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE, who had given Notice of a Question on this subject, wished to state that copies of the Bill had not been delivered on Saturday as promised. Something in the shape of a Bill, but without the name of any sponsor on the back, had been delivered; but there was nothing from which he could suppose that it was a Government

Bill. It seemed rather a Bill of some irresponsible private Member. He begged to ask the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he intends, during the operation of the measure which he proposes, to introduce on the same principle as the Clause which he put on the Paper for insertion into the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill, any Clause protecting landlords affected thereby from the penalties of foreclosure of any mortgage by reason of non-payment of interest, or from any other local consequences which might result from their inability to pay charges on their estates so long as the rent remains unpaid?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I am sorry the Bill has not been circulated, as I fully expected, on Saturday morning, and as I had received assurances that it would be. It was, however, circulated on the afternoon of Saturday. The Question the hon. Baronet asks relates, not to what the Bill will be, but what will be done during the operation of the measure. I must most respectfully decline to answer this Question, and also the three Questions which stand in the names of the hon. Member for Portarlington (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). I wish to show the utmost courtesy with regard to Questions; I never declined to answer one before, and I should not do so now if I did not think I was consulting the general convenience and interest of the House in this course. I understand the object of Questions is to gain information, and to know facts with regard to administration and the intentions of the Government. Those hon. Members are perfectly aware of the intentions of the Government, which were declared in the clause for which this Bill is a substitution. They have also been informed by the Bill that was sent round. Every one of these Questions is really an argumentative Question, and would require a speech in reply to each. I am perfectly ready to answer arguments in discussion on the Bill, which I hope will be taken to-morrow; but I think I should be unduly taking up the time of the House, and establishing a precedent which would be inconvenient, if I replied now.

THE NEW LAW COURTS—VENTILATION, &c.

SIR JOHN HOLKER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any plans for ventilating and warming the new Law Courts have as yet been definitely adopted; and, if so, whether he would give orders that such plans be placed in the Library of the House for the inspection of those Members who may wish to see them?

MR. ADAM: Sir, plans for the ventilation and warming of the new Law Courts have been adopted. These plans can be seen at the architect's office. They are very voluminous, and there is only one copy. Tenders are now being invited for carrying out the work, and, pending the acceptance of any of these tenders, it would be manifestly inconvenient that copies of the plans should be placed in the Library for general inspection.

TURKEY—THE TURKISH PARLIAMENT.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the re-assembling of the Turkish Parliament forms any part of the policy of Her Majesty's Ministers in Turkey, seeing that all reference to such a course is absent from the instructions sent by the Foreign Secretary to the Special Ambassador at Constantinople as lately laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to say that I am afraid he has not been quite so careful and accurate in the perusal of the Papers as, no doubt, he usually is. At page 12 of the Papers (Turkey, No. 7) the question of the assembling of the Turkish Parliament, or the constitution of the Turkish Parliament is referred to.

AFGHANISTAN—ABDUR RAHMAN.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as reported, that Abdur Rahman is accompanied in Afghanistan by a Russian official?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the first telegram, in March, stated that Abdur Rahman was accompanied by two Russian officers, but that information has never been confirmed since.

So far as we know, there is no reason to suppose that any Russian accompanies Abdur Rahman.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—RELIEF TO IRISH LANDLORDS.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, as the Government have announced their intention of bringing in a Bill by which, in the distressed districts of Ireland, tenants unable to pay their rents are to be entitled to claim compensation from the landlords to whom their rent is due, Whether he will extend the principle so that landlords residing in the same districts who are unable to pay their local and imperial taxes, Tithe Rent-charges, &c. may, in consequence of this inability, become entitled to compensation out of the Consolidated Fund, Irish Church surplus, or from any other source?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am a little sorry that the hon Gentleman has thought it necessary to put this Question after the reply just given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Without troubling the House by entering into any details, I must say that, for the reasons stated by my right hon. Friend, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be so kind and courteous as to excuse my answering the Question.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — CIRCULAR OF THE LIBERAL CENTRAL OFFICE — TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF OUTVOTERS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the statement of the circular of the Liberal Central Office that the payment of travelling expenses of outvoters for boroughs would subject the person making such payment to a penalty of forty shillings is a correct statement of the Law; and, if not, what would be the consequence to the person making such payment of his illegal act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): Sir, the Question assumes that the circular contained a certain statement in relation to the law. My information of the contents of the circular is derived from newspaper reports. But assuming that the facts are as stated in the Question of the hon. Member, then the statement of law is correct.

PETTY SESSIONS CLERKS' SALARIES.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the salaries of petty sessions clerks in Ireland vary according to the amount of fines imposed, thereby giving these officials a direct interest in the number of convictions, and, whether, if so, he will bring in a measure to assimilate their mode of payment to that in force in England, where the justices' clerks are paid a fixed salary independent of the number or amount of fines?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have asked for the information, and I have not yet received it, and I must ask the hon. Member to postpone his Question.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—
HOWTH HARBOUR.

MR. DAWSON (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the attention of the Irish Board of Works has been directed to the neglected condition of the Harbour of Howth, and the great inconvenience and loss suffered by the fishermen owing to its not being sufficiently dredged; what is the average amount of the tolls levied for the use of the Harbour and the average amount expended on dredging and maintenance; and, whether steps will be taken to make the Harbour more available for the large fishing population using it?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the attention of the Irish Board of Works has been recently drawn to the state of Howth Harbour, and their engineer was sent to report as to its present condition. The Harbour is very much exposed to the danger of being silted up; but I am informed that the effectual dredging carried on in the years subsequent to the passing of the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 72, for the improvement of the Harbour, has proved sufficient up to the present time for the safe accommodation of the large fleet of fishing vessels—Cornish, Manx, Scotch, and Irish—which frequent it. The average amount of dues received during the last seven years has been £507 7s. 11d., and the average amount of money expended during the same period has been £2,152 6s. As soon as the costly works of repair which are now being carried out are completed, which will be soon, it is intended to consider whether a renewal of the dredging will be necessary for the better accommodation of the fishing-boats, which appear to be of a deeper draught than was the case formerly.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—MAPS, &c., OF
THE RELIEF WORKS IN IRELAND.

MAJOR NOLAN (for Mr. MITCHELL HENRY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the ordnance map showing the relief works authorised by the Government in the county of Galway up to the 16th June, together with a Return of the number and estimated cost of the works presented for at the Special Sessions in each of the baronies of Ballynahinch, Moycullen, and Ross; and, a Return of a number of these works passed by the Board of Works, but subsequently rejected by the Local Government Board, together with their estimated cost, and showing also the works allowed by the Government and actually in progress, with the number of men employed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, If the hon. and gallant Member will move for a Return I will agree to it. At the same time, I must state that the Local Government Board and the Board of Works have duties in Ireland which it is necessary they should perform for the health and the safety of the people. The getting out of a Return must necessarily take up much time, and to some extent distract the officials from their real work. Hon. Members should be sure that Returns are necessary before they press for them.

NAVY—FLOGGING IN THE NAVY,

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Lord Northbrook's professional advisers had recommended that the punishment of flogging should be retained in the Navy for the offence of mutiny with violence, or in any other case?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, Lord Northbrook's professional advisers have not recommended that flogging in the Navy should be retained for the offence referred to or in any other case.

NAVY—DEATH OF COMMANDER
BRUCE.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty have taken any steps to inquire into the causes of the late Commander Bruce's death; and whether they are satisfied that it was by no means attributable to the neglect of the Coast Guard?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the Admiralty have taken steps to inquire into the cause of the sad occurrence in question, and they are satisfied that no negligence can be imputed to the Coast Guard.

IRISH LAND ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Royal Commission about to be appointed to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870 will be instructed to report in time to enable the Government to bring in a Bill next Session on the tenure of land in Ireland?

LORD ELCHO asked, Whether the names of the Commissioners and the instructions given to them would be laid on the Table?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the noble Lord, from his long experience in this House, ought to be aware that Notice is generally given of such a Question as he has put. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Sligo, I have to say that a Commission will be instructed to report as soon as possible. I trust that the Report will be made before next Session; but, of course, it will be impossible to dictate to a Commission the time which it ought to take for its Inquiry. That must depend, to some measure, upon what the Commission find to inquire into; but I wish the House to be aware that one great object which the Government have in appointing this Commission is to get not only a full put a speedy Report.

LORD ELCHO begged to apologize to his right hon. Friend for having put the Question without Notice. He had, however, thought that, under the circumstances, the Question was one which would not require a Notice, for the Government must already have made up its mind in regard to the matter; but he would repeat it. Connected with the same subject, he desired to ask a Question as to the Business for Tuesday. There were two Bills down on the Paper—namely, the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, and the Tenant Act, 1870, Amendment Bill. The first was that which they now understood to be the Government Bill, and which was down for the second reading; and the other was that of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), the debate on the second reading of which had been adjourned. It was his impression, and the impression of many other hon. Members, that the day had been given for the adjourned debate, and he thought that it was not customary under such circumstances to put another Bill down first. He wished, therefore, to ask the Government, Whether they would take first the adjourned discussion on the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo, or whether they would go on with their own Bill, which stood first on the Paper; and whether there was any understanding between the Government and the hon. Member for Mayo on the subject?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, no understanding has been come to with the hon. Member for Mayo, or with any hon. Member from Ireland, in regard to this Bill; but both myself and my right hon. Friend would wish that course to be taken which is most convenient to the House, and I have no doubt that all hon. Members will have the same wish. It is quite true that several days ago, on this question being brought forward by the hon. Member for Mayo, my right hon. Friend consented—though at considerable inconvenience to other Government Business—to the discussion on the Bill being postponed until to-morrow. I brought in a Bill on Friday night, and fixed it for to-morrow. But I found the next morning, without having said anything to the Officers of the House, that it being a Government Bill, it took precedence of that of the hon. Member for Mayo. Well, now, I cannot help thinking that, as this is a matter of great importance, it will be for the convenience of the House that I should be allowed to explain at the beginning of the debate the position which we take, and the ground on which we bring forward the Bill. Though I have no understanding with the hon. Member for Mayo, I rather hope that he will not object to this course being taken, and if that hon. Member raises no objection I do not suppose the noble Lord will.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—FAMINE FEVER IN MAYO.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the Government have received in London any confirmation of the serious news from Ireland which I see reported in The Evening Standard in reference to the outbreak of famine fever in Ireland? It is contained in a report from the hon. secretary of the Charleston, county Mayo, Relief Committee, and he says—

“The famine fever (and a most dangerous type) is now very prevalent, and making such progress that I fear there will not be ere long a village in all the parish free from it. Of course the destitute were the first to be visited by this awful disease; but, like death itself, it respects no persons, and very shortly makes its unwelcome visit to the well-to-do and independent. I have seen three pass by me this week to the workhouse from the little village in which I reside. Only the week before I saw the widow borne to the grave from her orphans, and only the wall separates me from the room where the wife of a respected member of our committee lies dangerously ill.”

I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, having the experience of 1847 before him, he has any information on this sad subject?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I am glad that my hon. and learned Friend has asked the Question. On seeing in The Daily News this morning the account which my hon. and learned Friend has read from The Evening Standard, I immediately telegraphed to the Local Government Board directing them to take immediate steps, and to send a medical inspector. I have no information so recent as that which has been referred to by the hon. and learned Member; but I have received a communication from the Mansion House Committee this morning on a different subject, but which contained no allusion to the fever. I am quite clear that there must be some fact behind it, though I hope it will turn out that it has been somewhat exaggerated. Without casting any reproach on anybody in reference to this statement, it is, I think, but natural that it should have been exaggerated. A few days ago I heard of fever in this district, and I have reason to believe that it was originated in the workhouse; but I cannot give the House positive facts with regard to it. My hon. and learned Friend is quite right in assuming that when I hear of fever in a distressed district I regard it as a subject of considerable alarm; but it is not proved to me that this is famine fever. I am sorry to say that, a few days ago, I found it necessary to dissolve the Board of Guardians of a Union, they being unable to contend with the distress. The Local Government Board have since appointed fresh Guardians, and I have both telegraphed and written that every attention should be paid, and that if it is a matter of money to save the life the money must be expended.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he would send instructions to the Inspector who will be sent down by the Local Government Board to extend his inquiries to the Union of Swineford, because in that Union it is reported that cases of fever have arisen from insufficiency of food? I wish also to state, with the indulgence of the House, that in a parish near Castlebar, deaths have occurred within the last week or 10 days from the same cause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Inspector will be directed to inquire into all those districts, especially that of Swineford, and one or two neighbouring districts.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice that, in consequence of the failure of the Swineford Board of Guardians to perform the duties imposed on it, and the present emergency in Ireland, and the probable failure of other Boards of Guardians in similar circumstances, he should tomorrow ask for leave to bring in a Bill allocating £100,000 from the Irish Church Surplus Fund for the immediate relief of the distress in Ireland, and constituting a body for the administration of that Fund.

WAYS AND MEANS—LICENCE DUTIES.

In reply to Sir HERVEY BRUCE,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, for the purpose of charging the duty according to the proposed new scale of Licence Duties, the value of a house and its appurtenances would be ascertained in the same way as at present under the provisions of the General Excise Licensing Act, the 6 Geo. IV. c. 81, s. 5. If that method of charging were unsatisfactory, and the hon. Member would be kind enough to let him know in what particulars, he would consider them with care.

MOTION.

MR. BRADLAUGH.—RESOLUTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in rising to move—

said: It will be in the recollection of the House that shortly after you, Sir, first took your seat in that Chair, at the commencement of the Session, Mr. Bradlaugh, having been duly elected a Member for the borough of Northampton, came forward to the Table and asked to be allowed to affirm his allegiance instead of taking the Oath of Allegiance. You, Sir, then came to the conclusion that you were not prepared to decide this important question, and you, therefore, referred it to the House. The House referred it to a Committee, and that Committee reported that Mr. Bradlaugh could not make an Affirmation. That Report was laid on the Table, but no action was taken upon it. It was not discussed, and the House neither accepted nor rejected it. Upon this, Mr. Bradlaugh, being anxious to know whether the alternative of taking the Oath was open to him, again came to the Table. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) rose, and, as a question of Privilege, protested against Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to take the Oath. Again, after considerable discussion, the matter was referred to a Committee. That Committee decided that Mr. Bradlaugh could not take the Oath of Allegiance; but it appended to this a recommendation advising the House that it would be desirable to allow him to affirm. Mr. Bradlaugh, therefore, is in this position. Should the House act upon the finding of the first Committee and not allow him to affirm, and act upon the finding of the second Committee so far as not to allow him to take the Oath, he would be unable to take his seat. Thus, the House will be brought into conflict with a constituency of some importance. [“No!”] I really do not understand why an hon. Member opposite should cry “No!” It surely is enough to attack one of the Members of the constituency without attacking the constituency itself. I repeat that the constituency is of some importance, and I will go further, and say of great importance; and this most important constituency would be partially disfranchised, and would have only one Representative instead of two accorded to it by the Constitution in this House. Now, I think it is an open question whether the second Committee was right in coming to the conclusion that Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be allowed to take the Oath. I say this, not upon my own opinion, but because there are many constitutional authorities who hold that the House has absolutely no right to interfere with a Member when he comes up to take the Oath of Allegiance. I believe there is only one precedent of a like character, and that precedent is from the time of Queen Elizabeth. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth barristers who practised were not allowed to sit for counties. Lord Chancellor Bacon, then Attorney General, was returned for a county, and came to take the Oath which Gentlemen had to take before taking their seats. This was objected to on the ground that he was a practising barrister, and on that occasion the House of Commons came to this decision—“Their oath their own consciences, not we, to examine.” I think that is a precedent which goes to allow any Gentleman to take the Oath, and acts as an impediment to the House inquiring into the religious or other motives or feelings which actuate him in taking that Oath. But I do not wish to contest this question, because I am perfectly aware that there is a strong feeling in this House that it would be in a certain measure indecorous to allow a Gentleman who had stated that the most sacred words of the Oath are an unmeaning form to come to the Table and to repeat them. I, to a great extent, agree with hon. Gentlemen in this view. I think it would be infinitely preferable that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm; and it is because I am of that opinion that I ask the House to assent to the Motion that stands in my name. Now, a good deal of extraneous matter has been introduced into the discussions respecting this question. Speeches very valuable from a literary point of view have been addressed to the House; but, unfortunately, they were somewhat beyond the issue. The issue is a strictly legal issue. The question really that is submitted to the House is this—Has Mr. Bradlaugh a legal right to affirm instead of taking the Oath; and if he has this right, is it not just and expedient that he should be allowed to do so? The law lies in a nutshell. I am not myself a lawyer, and were it not that the legal portion of this question is exceedingly clear, I should hardly venture to seek to explain it to the House. In 1866, the only persons who were allowed to affirm in Courts of Justice were Quakers, Separatists, Moravians, and others who had a religious objection to taking an oath. In that year the Parliamentary Oaths Bill was passed, and it is upon the 4th section of that Act that Mr. Bradlaugh claims his right to make Affirmation. It is—

“Every person of the persuasion of the people called Quakers, and every other person for the time being by law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath, may, instead of taking and subscribing the Oath hereby appointed, make and subscribe a solemn Affirmation.”

It is a well-known principle of law that the restrictive words must not by implication, or by interpretation, be introduced into enabling Acts. These enabling words must be understood in their fullest sense, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen to remember that this Parliamentary Oaths Act is an enabling Act. Bearing this in view, I ask them to look at these words. It would be difficult to suppose that the words “every other person” mean alone those who are specifically stated in the Act; but this difficulty becomes almost an impossibility when, after “every other person,” the words “for the time being by law permitted to make a solemn affirmation” are added. I am perfectly aware that lawyers are very fond of surplusage; but this is not a question of surplusage. If it be asserted that only those who are mentioned in the Act may affirm, it is a question of sheer, unmitigated nonsense. The words can only be understood by anybody who reads them in a plain and practical sense to mean that Mr. Bradlaugh, or, indeed, any other Member, may affirm, who is for the time being permitted to affirm, instead of taking the oath, in a Court of Justice. There is another point in connection with the language of this section to which I wish to call the attention of the House. Hon. Gentlemen will see that the words are, “Instead of taking an oath may instead of taking and subscribing the oath hereby appointed.” It is a remarkable fact that in this section, where the intention of the Legislature to allude to the Parliamentary Oath is certain, the words “an oath” are used; and in every other section of the Act where the intention is also equally certain, either “the oath” or “the oath aforesaid” is used. It is only in this particular phrase, where presumably all oaths are alluded to, that the words “an oath” are substituted for “the oath,” and “the oath aforesaid.” In 1869 the Evidence Further Amendment Act was passed; and the 4th section of that Act is—

“If any person called to give evidence in any Court of Justice, whether in a civil or a criminal proceeding, shall object to take an oath, or shall be objected to as incompetent to take an oath, such person shall, if the presiding judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect upon his conscience, make the following promise and declaration.”

There is no question that Mr. Bradlaugh has been allowed in Courts of Justice to affirm instead of taking an oath. He has not only been allowed to do this as a witness, but he has been allowed by no less an authority than Mr. Baron Bramwell to affirm instead of taking an oath before taking his place in the jury-box as foreman of a jury. That, I think, is important, because a grave distinction is raised by hon. Gentlemen between promissory and Parliamentary Oaths. What are the objections which can be raised against the proposals which I have made? The first is what I may call the distinction argument. Hon. Gentlemen say there is a distinction between Parliamentary Oaths and witness oaths. We who are in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh affirming do not deny that there is this distinction. It is the ground on which we base our belief that Mr. Bradlaugh is entitled to affirm. What we say is, that it is precisely because a distinction was recognized and alluded to in the Parliamentary Oaths Bill that Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to affirm. The other objection urged is, that the section of the Evidence Further Amendment Act states that a presiding Judge must be satisfied. But you, Sir, are the presiding judge. ["No!"] An hon. Gentleman says "No!" I shall undertake to show that you are. In 1870, the Evidence Further Amendment Act was passed. In this Act I find the following clause:—

"The words 'Court of Justice' and 'presiding judge' in Section 4 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, shall be deemed to include any person or persons having by law authority to administer an oath for the taking of evidence."

In the next year the Parliamentary Evidence Act was passed. In that there is this section—

"An Oath or Affirmation under this Act may be administered by the Speaker of the House of Commons."

Therefore, it is very clear that you, Sir, may administer an oath; therefore, you are the presiding judge. ["No!"] Well, I consider it is pretty clear. Hon. Gentlemen say "No!" and, perhaps, it will gratify hon. Gentlemen to know that it is not absolutely necessary for my contention that you should be regarded as the presiding judge. I merely thought it right to state my opinion in reference to an anticipated objection. If Mr. Bradlaugh went before a Court of Law he would have to satisfy the presiding judge of the Court of Law that an oath is not binding on his conscience, before he was allowed to affirm; but any hon. Gentleman has only to read the Act to see that, assuming he may affirm, he has not to satisfy you that the Oath is not binding on his conscience. All that he has to do is to satisfy you that he has satisfied a presiding Judge somewhere else. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh. I do not know whether law is laughable to them or not; but that is the law, and I should like to see any hon. Gentleman of great legal experience get up and deny it. At the commencement of each Session a book is forwarded to all Gentlemen in this House called the "Rules, Orders, Forms, and Proceedings of the House." It is not absolutely official; but it emanates from so high an authority—the Clerk of the House—that it is almost official. I find in No. 22, it is stated that—

Mr. Labouchere

according to law. Who are these others? I know that there is a certain sect who once were Quakers, and that they might be meant; but does not the word "Quaker" cover them, and, whether it does or not, does not the word "others" cover everybody else? I know there are some Gentlemen who think they can see through a stone wall. These Gentlemen will not take the plain simple meaning of a sentence, but they always imagine there is something more in a thing than meets the eye. Lawyers, from contending that black is white or white is black in Courts of Justice, are much given to this habit of mind; but I appeal to any hon. Gentleman not afflicted with this mania to read the Acts I have quoted, and, unless he is prepared to abjure Lindley Murray and every other text-writer of the English language, to tell me whether the plain grammatical construction of the language of the 4th section does not allow Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm in this House? The Parliamentary Oaths Act was brought in by the late Sir George Grey. He was not a tyro. No Gentleman knew better the Forms of the House. No Gentleman understood better the English language; and it is impossible to suppose he would have deliberately inserted words which, unless they bear the interpretation I have put upon them, are absolute nonsense. I will now go to the question of the two Committees. The first, it will be admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, was somewhat hastily formed. They themselves protested against the haste with which it was appointed. It was appointed in such haste that the hon. and gallant Member for county Galway (Major Nolan), being in Ireland when he received the intimation that he was upon it, found that, though he made all speed to return to England, the decision had already been arrived at before he reached town. This imperfectly-formed Committee were divided in opinion as to whether Mr. Bradlaugh might affirm or might not affirm, and the decision was come to by the vote of the Chairman; and it will not be inconsistent with the general respect in which the right hon. Gentleman is held to say that a decision come to by the preponderance of his one vote is not quite the same as one arrived at by a majority of the House or a majority of the Committee. The Attorney General and the Solicitor General voted in the minority. If we were unhappily engaged in some legal conflict with a foreign nation we should appeal to the advice of our Attorney General and Solicitor General. Is it actually suggested that we should engage in a conflict with a constituency when our Attorney General and Solicitor General tell us we are in the wrong and the constituency in the right? If even the second Committee had not recommended that Mr. Bradlaugh be allowed to affirm, I should have challenged the decision of the first Committee. The reason why I did not do so at first was that Mr. Bradlaugh presented himself at the Table and wished to know whether he might adopt an alternative course. I do not ask the House to adopt the recommendation of the second Committee because it is their recommendation; for I fully admit it was not entirely within the scope of the reference to the Committee. But I ask the House to consider that very wise and learned Gentlemen, by a considerable majority, came to the conclusion that this was the best way out of the difficulty. As the Committee has pointed out, if you allow Mr. Bradlaugh to come to the Table and affirm, your action is in no way final. All you do is to say that there is such doubt on the question that you will not step in and prevent his affirming. The right of his doing so can be raised by any hon. Member in a Court of Justice. It would be well to remove this question from the somewhat emotional atmosphere of this House into the calm and temperate region of a Court of Law. It has been asserted that the Judges would be influenced by the decision of the House on this question. It is impossible to suppose such a thing. In the interpretation of the Statutes for themselves the Judges are not likely to be more influenced by the decision of this House than by that of any other corporate body. Comparisons are sometimes invidious, and, therefore, I must not make them; but I would point out to the House the very eminent names in the list of the hon. Gentlemen who have advised the House to let the hon. Member for Northampton come to the Table and affirm. We have the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, Serjeant Simon,

Mr. Watkin Williams, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Bright, Mr. Childers, and Major Nolan, who, had he been here, would probably have turned the vote of the Committee. Then there is Mr. Hopwood, who did vote on the first occasion that Mr. Bradlaugh could not be allowed to affirm, but who, on second thoughts, had come to the conclusion that he should. ["No!"] Well, that although he is not entitled to affirm, yet he ought to be allowed to affirm by the House. As practical men we ought to look at the consequences of not allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm. I do not myself precisely know what he is to do. But I will suppose that, not being allowed to affirm, he goes to that Table, and asks to be allowed to take the Oath. He is ordered to retire. If he does not retire, I presume he would be taken into custody. He would, I presume, be put in confinement. We will assume that he would be at some time let out. He would then come again to the Table. I think it very possible the House would get tired of this, and would then say—"We can declare the election void." Mr. Bradlaugh would go down to Northampton. He would be re-elected. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen will allow me to say that I do know something about that. I can assure the House—of course I cannot be certain—but I can assure hon. Members that, to the best of my belief, Mr. Bradlaugh will be re-elected. ["No!"] Well, possibly; I say very probably he would be re-elected. He would again tender himself to take the Oath. The same scene would be gone over again. Mr. Bradlaugh would again go back, and would again be re-elected. You would then, if you still declined to allow him to enter the House, create a species of martyr. The consequence of your not allowing him to affirm would be that in the end Mr. Bradlaugh would come to that Table and repeat the words which we regard as sacred and he does not. If you think there is a certain measure of profanity in allowing that, it is you that would put yourselves in that position. Mr. Bradlaugh himself asks to be allowed to affirm. It is you who say he should not be allowed to do so. The Oath was never intended as a religious disability. The sole object of the Oath or Affirmation is to enable a Member who is elected to make a declaration of his allegiance. It is true that for a time these Oaths were a religious disability, in the case, for instance, of Jews and Quakers. But what happened? The House interfered to put away that disability. It is contrary to—it is repugnant to—the feelings of all men of tolerant minds that any Gentleman should be hindered from performing civil functions in this world on account of speculative opinions regarding another world. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen exclaim as if I were uttering some new doctrine. In 1837 there was a Bill brought into Parliament and passed, called the Municipal Officers' Declaration Bill. The Act was to enable Quakers, Separatists, and Moravians to make a declaration instead of an oath. It was moved that the words "and others" be inserted. This was not carried, and the following Protest remains on the books of the House of Lords, signed by Lord Holland, Lord Radnor, Lord Denman, and Lord Brougham—

"Because the introduction of these denominations in the declaration may, in my apprehension, lead to vexatious litigation, and such litigation to yet more vexatious inquiries respecting theological and speculative tenets of individuals—inquiries on principle unjustifiable, and in practice injurious to religious liberty. The right of a man to substitute the declaration proposed by this Bill for that enacted by the Act of George IV. might be questioned, on the score of his not being, as he professed to be in the declaration, a Quaker, a Moravian, or a Separatist, and the Court of Law called upon to try his right under the words of the Statute would thus be compelled to pronounce judgment on the character of his religious creed, a jurisdiction which no human, or at least no secular, tribunal has the right or the means to assume, and which is more accordant with the spirit of the Inquisition at Rome than consistent with the habits and professions of a Protestant community and a free people."

Sir George Grey seems to have taken a large view of his own Bill, for in the debate on the Parliamentary Oaths Bill of 1866 he says—

"Let no man be asked any question as to his religion, but let him take his seat in the House if qualified to sit there in the opinion of those who sent him there, on taking the oath of allegiance as a loyal subject of the Crown."—[3 Hansard, clxxxi. 456.]

The Oath in that passage, I may explain,

Mr. Labouchere

means Oath or Affirmation, for Section 4 of that Act says—

"The affirmation of allegiance shall have the same effect as the making and subscribing of the oath hereby appointed."

So that Sir George Grey wished that every person duly elected by a constituency should come to that Table and be allowed, without any question as to religious belief, or absence of religious belief, to take the Oath or to affirm. It is no novelty to say that it is most desirable that whenever the State imposes upon a Member of a Legislature the necessity of taking an Oath he should be allowed to substitute an Affirmation. The founders of the American Republic, in order that there should be no mistake about their toleration, incorporated in their Constitution a distinct declaration that in no case should any gentleman called upon to take the Oath be forced to take it if he preferred to make an Affirmation. A few years ago, in the late Civil War, there was an Oath so stringent as to earn the title of the Iron-clad Oath. Its object was to oblige anyone elected to the public offices to swear that he had not taken part directly or indirectly in the Rebellion. Even in regard to that Oath the Americans stuck to the principle of their Constitution, and laid it down that anyone might affirm instead of taking the Oath. On this particular issue it is undesirable to come into conflict with constituencies and to interfere with their free choice of their own Members. In Northampton there are, perhaps, fewer persons than in almost any other town of its size of Mr. Bradlaugh's way of thinking in religious matters. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh. Do hon. Gentlemen think that when Mr. Bradlaugh is in a town to give lectures on his particular views he must necessarily convert everyone? As a matter of fact, there are exceedingly few persons in Northampton of Mr. Bradlaugh's views. Mr. Bradlaugh was elected on a political issue; and so strong is the feeling that the constituency would be badly used if Mr. Bradlaugh were not allowed to take his seat, that I am convinced that the majority of Mr. Bradlaugh over any Conservative that became a candidate would be still greater now than at his last election. This is not the case of a Gentleman having been elected saying he will not conform to the regulations of the House. Twenty-five years ago, a Quaker was sent to prison by the House for refusing to take the Oath; but Mr. Bradlaugh says—

“I should prefer to take the Affirmation, which is more binding on my conscience; but I am prepared to take either the Affirmation or the Oath. I am fully prepared to go through the forms necessary for taking my seat.”

It is the House that interferes and says he shall not be allowed to take the Oath. I think it would be most desirable to weigh the justice and expediency of this course before finally adopting it. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) has given Notice of an Amendment to my Resolution. This Amendment seems to me somewhat strangely worded. The late Solicitor General asks the House to run counter to the Report of the second Committee. I merely mention this, because it is possible that considerable stress will be laid on the circumstance of our running counter to the Report of a Select Committee. I am, therefore, obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for having brought in an Amendment which knocks out the bottom of that argument; because, if he asks the House not to agree to the Report of the second Committee, he can hardly object to me or any other Gentleman asking the House not to agree with the Report of the first Committee. I have endeavoured to make the matter as clear as I can from a legal point of view; and, in any case, I trust the House will not allow itself, when acting with judicial functions, to act with any personal feeling with regard to the Gentleman now before it. The question ought to be an A and B one as it affects Mr. Bradlaugh. The question is a general one as to whether Mr. Bradlaugh has the right to affirm instead of taking the Oath of Allegiance; and as to whether, if he has that right, it is just and expedient on the part of the House to allow him to exercise it. I beg to move that Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for the borough of Northampton, be admitted to make an Affirmation or Declaration, instead of the Oath required by Law.

MR. C. M'LAREN, in seconding the Motion, remarked that there were many Members in the House who felt with him that if the law permitted they would very much rather make the Affirmation asked for by the hon. Member for Northampton than take the Oath that the law compelled them to take. But it was a satisfaction to think that the debate must lead to such a conclusion as to enable the majority to signify, as he believed would be the case, their disapproval of the present system. He insisted that the question should be decided on purely technical considerations; and these, in his opinion, were amply sufficient to justify the House in accepting the Motion. They had had the evidence of two Committees, and still, to a certain extent, their decision was unfettered. He hoped that the Motion would meet the necessities of the case, and begged the House to remember that, if Mr. Bradlaugh were allowed to make an Affirmation, it would be possible to test his right to do so in a Court of Law. He could hardly suppose that the House intended partially to disfranchise the borough of Northampton, or to deprive Mr. Bradlaugh of rights that were clearly correlative to his duties as a Member of Parliament. If Mr. Bradlaugh might neither take the Oath nor make an Affirmation, the House would be logically almost driven to expel him; and he believed there was no precedent for expelling a Member before he had taken his seat. It seemed to him that the House should attach some weight to the opinions of the majority of the Committee, including six eminent lawyers, besides the Law Officers of the Crown. He would ask the House to consider what would be their position and the position of the English people if they, unhappily, came to the conclusion of ostracising Mr. Bradlaugh. If they did so, he could not see how they would be able to admit a Moravian, or any other person who, from religious grounds, would refuse to take the Oath; and he would like to hear who were the “other persons” who might enter the House without taking the Oath, if it were not persons like Mr. Bradlaugh. If they excluded him, the House would have decided that no Member should be admitted until an inquisition had been previously held outside as to his religious opinions. They would thus practically fetter the constituencies by telling them that unless they returned a Member whose views were in accordance with those of the normal majority of the House they would be excluded from any representation. Such a course would strike a most fatal blow at Constitutional principles, and a still more fatal blow against civil and religious liberty; and, as a Member of the Liberal Party that had been returned in overwhelming numbers, he should most deeply regret it if the House came to such a conclusion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for the Borough of Northampton, be admitted to make an Affirmation or Declaration, instead of the Oath required by Law."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD, in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That, having regard to the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees, appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72,"

said, that there was no Member of that House, if he excepted the hon. Member for Northampton himself, who did not heartily regret that this question had been raised. So far from having any desire to interrogate anyone as to his religious belief, they should have thought it a subject of special congratulation, and might possibly have entertained the charitable hypothesis that Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions did not continue the same as they had been, if without any notice he had come to the Table and taken the Oath in the ordinary manner. In that case no question would have been raised, and every hon. Gentleman about him would have deprecated any inquisitorial proceedings as to Mr. Bradlaugh's views. But it was impossible not to see that Mr. Bradlaugh's views had been thrust upon the House, and that important distinction must be obvious to everyone. Each man was the keeper of his own conscience, and if he kept it to himself it was his own affair; but if he challenged the House of Commons to say whether he was or was not entitled to take the Oath it was impossible for the House of Commons to shield itself by saying that each man must be guardian of his own conscience. The Members of that House were the guardians of the decency and the decorum of that great Assembly, and the Member for Northampton was now shifting to them the responsibility which he might have kept to himself. He would briefly recapitulate the history of this matter. A question was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman in turn invited the consideration of the House to it. At the instance of the Government a Committee was appointed, and that Committee reported. They had heard something about the Report having been carried by this vote or by that. He was himself unable to understand the attributing of the Report of a Committee which reported by a majority to the vote of any particular Member. The Report was the Report of the Committee. If anybody was to go behind a decision and examine the way in which each Member voted, and proceeded to weigh in the balance the authority of each particular Member, it was obvious that, whether as regarded Courts of Law or that House, the finality of the decision was gone. It was at the instance of Her Majesty's Government that this Committee was appointed, and when the Report was presented to the House one of two courses was open to them. Either Her Majesty's Government might have challenged, if they thought proper, the Report of the Committee, or they might, as they did, follow another course. They thought it right to move for another Committee, in which case the terms of Reference assumed the accuracy of the Report made by the first Committee. And, in truth, when the House discussed at some length the appointment of the second Committee, it was pointed out that it was very desirable to have a discussion on a question of law carried on without heat in a serener and more judicial atmosphere, and that a Committee was the atmosphere in which such a question ought to be debated. While it was assumed that the first Committee had disposed of the question of the Affirmation, the question of the Oath was referred to the second Committee. That question was debated with very considerable animation on each side, and what the Committee thought right they reported; but they were asked to add to the Report a matter which had not been remitted to them; and, in fact, to overrule the decision of the first Committee, the subject matter of the first Committee's decision not being within the preamble of the Reference. He admitted it might be said—"Oh, this is not overruling the legal principle laid down by the first Committee; but this recommendation, which is outside the Reference altogether, may be interpreted in this sense—that, assuming the first Committee to have been correct in the law laid down, the second Committee only recommends a form in which the question may be ultimately decided.” Well, that was about the most extraordinary proceeding ever heard of when they found appended to that recommendation the names of four Members of Her Majesty’s Government, two of them the Attorney General and the Solicitor General. That recommendation amounted to this—Whereas it had been decided and assumed to be the law that it was unlawful to make an Affirmation, in that case the Attorney General and Solicitor General recommended the law to be broken. They recommended the law to be broken in order that the Courts of Law might find out whether the Committee had decided right or not. He would have to quote a precedent presently where a somewhat similar question arose, and then he would show what the Leader of the House and the Prime Minister of the time said on the subject. But for the moment he would advert to the question raised before the first Committee. Considering the names of the Gentlemen who sat on that Committee, and that it was a question of law upon which lawyers of very great eminence had differed, he would not dogmatize or say that the question was too clear for argument. But he assumed, in the absence of any proceedings on the part of Her Majesty’s Government, that the decision of the first Committee was not to be challenged; and he was entitled to assume, therefore, that it would be unlawful to allow the Member for Northampton to make an Affirmation instead of an Oath. Now, the whole point in dispute had been assumed in the two orations to which they had listened. It was said that the word “others” in the Witnesses’ Oaths Act of 1871 must have referred to everybody, and not merely to persons who entertained a peculiar religious belief. But he held it very arguable that in the different stages of relaxation which the Legislature adopted it proceeded on the assumption of some religious feeling and some religious opinions, although not confined to particular sects and beliefs. The hon. Member for Northampton, in reading the Act of 1871, and referring to it as

He would have thought that these words, “according to my religious belief,” might have formed part of what the hon. Member read to the House, and might have been urged in favour of the view that religious persuasion was an essential condition of either taking the Oath where the Oath was lawful, or the Affirmation substituted for an Oath were the objection to the taking of an Oath was founded on religious belief. He would have thought that that argument was at least worthy of some notice in considering the question whether they were to adopt the Resolution of the first Committee or not. Although he did not put forward his opinion as of more value than that of any other hon. Member, yet he felt bound to give expression to it lest it might be thought that he did not entirely concur in the Report. Well, what course was suggested in face of the difficulty created by the hon. Member for Northampton himself? It was said in the recommendation of the Select Committee that—

“From the fact that this Report was carried by the vote of the Chairman, thus showing a great division of opinion among the Members of the Committee, the state of the law cannot be regarded as satisfactorily determined. Under these circumstances it appears to your Committee that Mr. Bradlaugh should have the liberty of having his statutory rights determined beyond doubt by being allowed to take the only step by which the legality of his making an Affirmation can be brought for decision before the High Court of Justice.”

That recommendation was entirely beyond the scope of their inquiry. They were not invited to make any such recommendation; and it could only have the authority of those who had appended their names to it. He would, however, take it for the moment as having the authority of the names appended to it. And now let him remind the House of the precedent that existed on this subject. When Mr. Alderman Salomons was returned for Greenwich there were three Oaths which every Member was strike a most fatal blow at Constitutional principles, and a still more fatal blow against civil and religious liberty; and, as a Member of the Liberal Party that had been returned in overwhelming numbers, he should most deeply regret it if the House came to such a conclusion.

He admitted it might be said—"Oh, this is a legal principle Committee; b"

that for a time these Oaths were a religious disability, in the case, for instance, of Jews and Quakers. But what happened? The House interfered to put away that disability. It is contrary to—it is repugnant to—the feelings of all men of tolerant minds that any Gentleman should be hindered from performing civil functions in this world on account of speculative opinions regarding another world. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen exclaim as if I were uttering some new doctrine. In 1837 there was a Bill brought into Parliament and passed, called the Municipal Officers' Declaration Bill. The Act was to enable Quakers, Separatists, and Moravians to make a declaration instead of an oath. It was moved that the words "and others" be inserted. This was not carried, and the following Protest remains on the books of the House of Lords, signed by Lord Holland, Lord Radnor, Lord Denman, and Lord Brougham—

"Because the introduction of these denominations in the declaration may, in my apprehension, lead to vexatious litigation, and such litigation to yet more vexatious inquiries respecting theological and speculative tenets of individuals—inquiries on principle unjustifiable, and in practice injurious to religious liberty. The right of a man to substitute the declaration proposed by this Bill for that enacted by the Act of George IV. might be questioned, on the score of his not being, as he professed to be in the declaration, a Quaker, a Moravian, or a Separatist, and the Court of Law called upon to try his right under the words of the Statute would thus be compelled to pronounce judgment on the character of his religious creed, a jurisdiction which no human, or at least no secular, tribunal has the right or the means to assume, and which is more accordant with the spirit of the Inquisition at Rome than consistent with the habits and professions of a Protestant community and a free people."

Sir George Grey seems to have taken a large view of his own Bill, for in the debate on the Parliamentary Oaths Bill of 1866 he says—

"Let no man be asked any question as to his religion, but let him take his seat in the House if qualified to sit there in the opinion of those who sent him there, on taking the oath of allegiance as a loyal subject of the Crown."—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 456.]

The Oath in that passage, I may explain,

Mr. Labouchere

means Oath or Affirmation, for Section 4 of that Act says—

"The affirmation of allegiance shall have the same effect as the making and subscribing of the oath hereby appointed."

So that Sir George Grey wished that every person duly elected by a constituency should come to that Table and be allowed, without any question as to religious belief, or absence of religious belief, to take the Oath or to affirm. It is no novelty to say that it is most desirable that whenever the State imposes upon a Member of a Legislature the necessity of taking an Oath he should be allowed to substitute an Affirmation. The founders of the American Republic, in order that there should be no mistake about their toleration, incorporated in their Constitution a distinct declaration that in no case should any gentleman called upon to take the Oath be forced to take it if he preferred to make an Affirmation. A few years ago, in the late Civil War, there was an Oath so stringent as to earn the title of the Iron-clad Oath. Its object was to oblige anyone elected to the public offices to swear that he had not taken part directly or indirectly in the Rebellion. Even in regard to that Oath the Americans stuck to the principle of their Constitution, and laid it down that anyone might affirm instead of taking the Oath. On this particular issue it is undesirable to come into conflict with constituencies and to interfere with their free choice of their own Members. In Northampton there are, perhaps, fewer persons than in almost any other town of its size of Mr. Bradlaugh's way of thinking in religious matters. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh. Do hon. Gentlemen think that when Mr. Bradlaugh is in a town to give lectures on his particular views he must necessarily convert everyone? As a matter of fact, there are exceedingly few persons in Northampton of Mr. Bradlaugh's views. Mr. Bradlaugh was elected on a political issue; and so strong is the feeling that the constituency would be badly used if Mr. Bradlaugh were not allowed to take his seat, that I am convinced that the majority of Mr. Bradlaugh over any Conservative that became a candidate would be still greater now than at his last election. This is not the case of a Gentleman having been elected saying he will

having made and subscribed the Oath should take part in debate or vote he should be subject to a penalty and his seat should be vacated in the same manner as if he were dead. Then they would have this whole debate over again on the question of the issue of the Writ. In these circumstances they were entitled to ask what was the intention of the Government? Were they in favour of the Motion or Amendment which had been placed on the Paper? He admitted that there was a remedy that could be applied. That remedy was legislation—legislation of the kind which was adopted when Sir David Salomons could not take his seat. The House on that occasion, under the leadership of Lord John Russell, positively declined to shrink from its plain straightforward obligations, or still less to be controlled by the action of third parties in Courts of Law. If ever there was an a fortiori case it was the one with which Lord John Russell was then dealing. His Lordship objected to the law as it was laid down by the lawyers. He was taunted again and again by his own followers that he would not allow Sir David Salomons to do that which would raise the question in the Courts of Law. He said—

“The first example we have to set is that of obedience to the law, and whatever we may think of the policy or expediency of the particular law that we complain of, or of what in our view is natural justice—the view I submit to the House of Commons is this, that we should ourselves be the first to set the example of obeying the law, and leave the Legislature to remedy that which is supposed to be unjust.”

The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. R. N. FOWLER: Mr. Speaker, It has been said that this is a delicate question. Sir, it seems to me to be not merely a delicate but a solemn question. The question before the House is, whether a man who denies the common God of Jew and Christian is to be permitted to sit in this House? Reference has been made to the Society of Friends and to the Jewish Persuasion. It seems to me to be an insult to both those Bodies to compare them to an Atheist. As regards the Society of Friends, allusion has been made to the late Mr. Joseph John Young. I would allude to the father and uncle of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster).

More holy and devoted men than these have seldom lived, and it would be an insult to their memory to compare them to the hon. Member for Northampton. As regards the Jews, I had the honour to sit in a former Parliament with the Gentlemen mentioned before the Committee—the two Barons de Rothschild and Sir David Salomons—and all who knew them will agree with me that they were eminently qualified to sit in this House. Sir, is it desirable to admit to this House one who denies the existence of God and of a future state? The example of the United States has great influence with hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I may remind the House that the United States refused to admit the territory of Utah into the Union. I may be told that this was rather on moral than on religious grounds. I might reply that objection may be taken to the moral as well as to the religious views of the hon. Member for Northampton. I do not insist on this, because, if a man denies God and a future state, I do not see how he can be expected to be a moral man. His language must necessarily be—“Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.” We are told to respect the verdict of the constituency of Northampton; I do not think the House is bound to do so. Twice has the great county of Tipperary returned men whom this House has refused to admit. I particularly refer to the case of Mr. O'Donovan Rossa, because his rejection was moved by the present Prime Minister. But, Sir, we have to look, not to the electors of Northampton, but to the people at large. I believe, if we cared to put to our constituents, apart from any question of confidence in the right hon. Gentleman I see before me, apart from any foreign or other question, a large majority of the people of England, and also of Ireland and Scotland, would say in reply to the appeal—“We will not have among our Rulers one who denies the God who is above.” Sir, on these grounds, because I believe that I am supported by the feeling of the people of England, because I am confident I express the views of that great constituency by whose favour I now stand before you; above all, because if I could assent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere), I should be recreant to my country, my Sovereign, and my God, I give my strike a most fatal blow at Constitutional principles, and a still more fatal blow against civil and religious liberty; and, as a Member of the Liberal Party that had been returned in overwhelming numbers, he should most deeply regret it if the House came to such a conclusion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for the Borough of Northampton, be admitted to make an Affirmation or Declaration, instead of the Oath required by Law."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD, in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That, having regard to the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees, appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72,"

said, that there was no Member of that House, if he excepted the hon. Member for Northampton himself, who did not heartily regret that this question had been raised. So far from having any desire to interrogate anyone as to his religious belief, they should have thought it a subject of special congratulation, and might possibly have entertained the charitable hypothesis that Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions did not continue the same as they had been, if without any notice he had come to the Table and taken the Oath in the ordinary manner. The Members of that House were the guardians of the decency and the decorum of that great Assembly, and the Member for Northampton was now shifting to them the responsibility which he might have kept to himself. He would briefly recapitulate the history of this matter. A question was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman in turn invited the consideration of the House to it. At the instance of the Government a Committee was appointed, and that Committee reported. They had heard something about the Report having been carried by this vote or by that. He was himself unable to understand the attributing of the Report of a Committee which reported by a majority to the vote of any particular Member. The Report was the Report of the Committee. It was at the instance of Her Majesty's Government that this Committee was appointed, and when the Report was presented to the House one of two courses was open to them. Either Her Majesty's Government might have challenged, if they thought proper, the Report of the Committee, or they might, as they did, follow another course. They thought it right to move for another Committee, in which case the terms of Reference assumed the accuracy of the Report made by the first Committee. And, in truth, when the House discussed at some length the appointment of the second Committee, it was pointed out that it was very desirable to have a discussion on a question of law carried on without heat in a serener and more judicial atmosphere, and that a Committee was the atmosphere in which such a question ought to be debated. While it was assumed that the first Committee had disposed of the question of the Affirmation, the question of the Oath was referred to the second Committee. That question was debated with very considerable animation on each side, and what the Committee thought right they reported; but they were asked to add to the Report a matter which had not been remitted to them; and, in fact, to overrule the decision of the first Committee, the subject matter of the first Committee's decision not being within the preamble of the Reference. He admitted it might be said—"Oh, this is not overruling the legal principle laid down by the first Committee; but this recommendation his outside the Reference altogether, be interpreted in this sense—that, naming the first Committee to have been correct in the law laid down, the second Committee only recommends a course in which the question may be ultimately decided." Well, that was about the most extraordinary proceeding ever known of when they found appended to their recommendation the names of four members of Her Majesty's Government, of whom the Attorney General and Solicitor General. That recommendation amounted to this—Whereas it had been decided and assumed to be the case that it was unlawful to make an affirmation, in that case the Attorney General and Solicitor General recommended the law to be broken. They recommended the law to be broken in the case that the Courts of Law might find whether the Committee had decided or not. He would have to quote a precedent presently where a somewhat similar question arose, and then he would show what the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister of the day had said on the subject. But for the moment he would advert to the question raised before the first Committee. Considering the names of the members who sat on that Committee, that it was a question of law upon which lawyers of very great eminence differed, he would not dogmatize or say that the question was too clear for argument. But he assumed, in the absence of any proceedings on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that the decision of the first Committee was not challenged; and he was entitled to assume, therefore, that it would be unlawful to allow the Member for Northampton to make an Affirmation instead of an Oath. Now, the whole point in the case had been assumed in the two opinions to which they had listened. It was said that the word "others" in the Oaths Act of 1871 must have been applied to everybody, and not merely to those who entertained a peculiar religious belief. But he held it very probable that in the different stages of legislation which the Legislature adopted proceeded on the assumption of some common feeling and some religious opinions, although not confined to particular sects and beliefs. The hon. Member for Northampton, in reading the Act of 1871, and referring to it as

He would have thought that these words, "according to my religious belief," might have formed part of what the hon. Member read to the House, and might have been urged in favour of the view that religious persuasion was an essential condition of either taking the Oath where the Oath was lawful, or the Affirmation substitute for an Oath where the objection to the taking of an Oath was founded on religious belief. He would have thought that that argument was at least worth giving some notice in considering the question whether they were to adopt the Resolution of the first Committee or not. Although he did not put forward his opinion as of more value than that of any other hon. Member, yet he felt bound to give expression to it lest it might be thought that he did not entirely concur in the Report. Well, what course was suggested in face of the difficulty created by the hon. Member for Northampton himself? It was said in the recommendation of the Select Committee that—

"From the fact that this Report was carried by the vote of the Chairman, thus showing a great division of opinion among the Members of the Committee, the state of the law cannot be regarded as satisfactorily determined. Under these circumstances it appears to your Committee that Mr. Bradlaugh should have the liberty of having his statutory rights determined beyond doubt by being allowed to take the only step by which the legality of his making an Affirmation can be brought for decision before the High Court of Justice."

That recommendation was entirely beyond the scope of their inquiry. They were not invited to make any such recommendation; and it could only have the authority of those who had appended their names to it. He would, however, take it for the moment as having the authority of the names appended to it. And now let him remind the House of the precedent that existed on this subject. When Mr. Alderman Salomon was returned for Greenwich there were three Oaths which every Member was bodies. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) remembered well how they were employed against the admission of his own community. It was the spirit of such arguments that lighted the fires of Smithfield, and established the Inquisition in Spain. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had, and could have, no kind of sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh or his opinions. He condemned and deplored them. But he held the right of conscience to be the most sacred of all human rights, and whether a man believed much, or little, or nothing at all, rested upon precisely the same common ground, the right of each man to determine for himself in matters of religion. To attempt to limit this right was to deny it altogether. To impose disabilities, or to punish a man, by withholding civil or political rights, because of his opinions, was a power which he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) could not concede to any man, or body of men. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) belonged to a race that had suffered more than any other for the sake of conscience, and, in many parts of the world, they suffered still. He, for one, would never use the rights he enjoyed as an Englishman to exclude another from equal participation in those rights. Least of all would he, because of his own religious convictions, by word or deed, join with those who would invade the sacred domain of conscience, and deny the right of private judgment.

MR. WARTON asked, "Where are we now?" The Attorney General, as representing the Government, had taken credit to himself for accepting the decision of the first Committee; and he wished to know whether it was at the instigation or with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government that the second Committee had appended to its Report the recommendation that Mr. Bradlaugh should be permitted to affirm—a matter which in no way entered into the scope of its inquiry? He hoped, and indeed believed, that the House, and especially the Liberal Members of it, would pause when they considered what a terrible effect would be produced in the country by voting in favour of the Motion which would admit Mr. Bradlaugh to the House. He agreed with the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), who seconded the Amendment, that the question was one of religion, and that if it were put to a vote of the country there would be a far larger majority against the Motion than that which returned the Liberal Party to power at the recent Election. The right hon. Gentlemen he saw opposite him (Mr. Gladstone and Mr. John Bright) were religious men, and he hoped they would not on the present occasion throw their shields over an infidel and a blasphemer. There was an assumption on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters that an infidel had a conscience—an assumption which he denied not only on broad grounds, but on the very derivation of the word, which implied a knowledge of some One with us, or the light of God in our own nature. In conclusion, he begged that every Member of the House who believed in God would vote against the "fool who hath said in his heart there is no God."

MR. WHITBREAD wished to remind hon. Members opposite of a fact which they had apparently forgotten, which was that when the first Committee in reference to this matter was appointed it was distinctly understood that the Report of the Committee was in no sense to decide the question, but was simply to be a means of affording information to the House to enable the general body of Members to arrive at a decision on a very difficult question. Then, again, it was sought to make the Government responsible for the course which had been pursued by the second Committee. Let them not forget that the Leader of the House proposed to appoint as the second Committee the very same Gentlemen who had formed the first. If that course had been followed it was but reasonable to suppose that the Committee would have come to a similar conclusion. But it was at the instigation, and at the express wish of the Leader of the Opposition, that new names were added, and that if a Report different from that anticipated had come out, it was rather hard to throw the responsibility on the Government. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) also based a considerable portion of his argument on the erroneous assumption that the Report of the first Committee had decided the law of the case, but admitted that the question was one of law. If this last proposition were true, which he (Mr. Whitbread) admitted, surely no tribunal could be so competent to decide it as the Law Courts.

that for a time these Oaths were a religious disability, in the case, for instance, of Jews and Quakers. But what happened? The House interfered to put away that disability. It is contrary to—it is repugnant to—the feelings of all men of tolerant minds that any Gentleman should be hindered from performing civil functions in this world on account of speculative opinions regarding another world. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen exclaim as if I were uttering some new doctrine. In 1837 there was a Bill brought into Parliament and passed, called the Municipal Officers' Declaration Bill. The Act was to enable Quakers, Separatists, and Moravians to make a declaration instead of an oath. It was moved that the words "and others" be inserted. This was not carried, and the following Protest remains on the books of the House of Lords, signed by Lord Holland, Lord Radnor, Lord Denman, and Lord Brougham—

"Because the introduction of these denominations in the declaration may, in my apprehension, lead to vexatious litigation, and such litigation to yet more vexatious inquiries respecting theological and speculative tenets of individuals—inquiries on principle unjustifiable, and in practice injurious to religious liberty. The right of a man to substitute the declaration proposed by this Bill for that enacted by the Act of George IV. might be questioned, on the score of his not being, as he professed to be in the declaration, a Quaker, a Moravian, or a Separatist, and the Court of Law called upon to try his right under the words of the Statute would thus be compelled to pronounce judgment on the character of his religious creed, a jurisdiction which no human, or at least no secular, tribunal has the right or the means to assume, and which is more accordant with the spirit of the Inquisition at Rome than consistent with the habits and professions of a Protestant community and a free people."

Sir George Grey seems to have taken a large view of his own Bill, for in the debate on the Parliamentary Oaths Bill of 1866 he says—

"Let no man be asked any question as to his religion, but let him take his seat in the House if qualified to sit there in the opinion of those who sent him there, on taking the oath of allegiance as a loyal subject of the Crown."—[3 Hansard, clxxxi. 456.]

The Oath in that passage, I may explain,

Mr. Labouchere

means Oath or Affirmation, for Section 4 of that Act says—

"The affirmation of allegiance shall have the same effect as the making and subscribing of the oath hereby appointed."

So that Sir George Grey wished that every person duly elected by a constituency should come to that Table and be allowed, without any question as to religious belief, or absence of religious belief, to take the Oath or to affirm. It is no novelty to say that it is most desirable that whenever the State imposes upon a Member of a Legislature the necessity of taking an Oath he should be allowed to substitute an Affirmation. The founders of the American Republic, in order that there should be no mistake about their toleration, incorporated in their Constitution a distinct declaration that in no case should any gentleman called upon to take the Oath be forced to take it if he preferred to make an Affirmation. A few years ago, in the late Civil War, there was an Oath so stringent as to earn the title of the Iron-clad Oath. Its object was to oblige anyone elected to the public offices to swear that he had not taken part directly or indirectly in the Rebellion. Even in regard to that Oath the Americans stuck to the principle of their Constitution, and laid it down that anyone might affirm instead of taking the Oath. On this particular issue it is undesirable to come into conflict with constituencies and to interfere with their free choice of their own Members. In Northampton there are, perhaps, fewer persons than in almost any other town of its size of Mr. Bradlaugh's way of thinking in religious matters. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh. Do hon. Gentlemen think that when Mr. Bradlaugh is in a town to give lectures on his particular views he must necessarily convert everyone? As a matter of fact, there are exceedingly few persons in Northampton of Mr. Bradlaugh's views. Mr. Bradlaugh was elected on a political issue; and so strong is the feeling that the constituency would be badly used if Mr. Bradlaugh were not allowed to take his seat, that I am convinced that the majority of Mr. Bradlaugh over any Conservative that became a candidate would be still greater now than at his last election. This is not the case of a Gentleman having been elected saying he will

having made and subscribed the Oath should take part in debate or vote he should be subject to a penalty and his seat should be vacated in the same manner as if he were dead. Then they would have this whole debate over again on the question of the issue of the Writ. In these circumstances they were entitled to ask what was the intention of the Government? Were they in favour of the Motion or Amendment which had been placed on the Paper? He admitted that there was a remedy that could be applied. That remedy was legislation—legislation of the kind which was adopted when Sir David Salomons could not take his seat. The House on that occasion, under the leadership of Lord John Russell, positively declined to shrink from its plain straightforward obligations, or still less to be controlled by the action of third parties in Courts of Law. If ever there was an a fortiori case it was the one with which Lord John Russell was then dealing. His Lordship objected to the law as it was laid down by the lawyers. He was taunted again and again by his own followers that he would not allow Sir David Salomons to do that which would raise the question in the Courts of Law. He said—

“The first example we have to set is that of obedience to the law, and whatever we may think of the policy or expediency of the particular law that we complain of, or of what in our view is natural justice—the view I submit to the House of Commons is this, that we should ourselves be the first to set the example of obeying the law, and leave the Legislature to remedy that which is supposed to be unjust.”

The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. R. N. FOWLER: Mr. Speaker, It has been said that this is a delicate question. Sir, it seems to me to be not merely a delicate but a solemn question. The question before the House is, whether a man who denies the common God of Jew and Christian is to be permitted to sit in this House? Reference has been made to the Society of Friends and to the Jewish Persuasion. It seems to me to be an insult to both those Bodies to compare them to an Atheist. As regards the Society of Friends, allusion has been made to the late Mr. Joseph John Young. I would allude to the father and uncle of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster).

More holy and devoted men than these have seldom lived, and it would be an insult to their memory to compare them to the hon. Member for Northampton. As regards the Jews, I had the honour to sit in a former Parliament with the Gentlemen mentioned before the Committee—the two Barons de Rothschild and Sir David Salomons—and all who knew them will agree with me that they were eminently qualified to sit in this House. Sir, is it desirable to admit to this House one who denies the existence of God and of a future state? The example of the United States has great influence with hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I may remind the House that the United States refused to admit the territory of Utah into the Union. I may be told that this was rather on moral than on religious grounds. I might reply that objection may be taken to the moral as well as to the religious views of the hon. Member for Northampton. I do not insist on this, because, if a man denies God and a future state, I do not see how he can be expected to be a moral man. His language must necessarily be—“Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.” We are told to respect the verdict of the constituency of Northampton; I do not think the House is bound to do so. Twice has the great county of Tipperary returned men whom this House has refused to admit. I particularly refer to the case of Mr. O'Donovan Rossa, because his rejection was moved by the present Prime Minister. But, Sir, we have to look, not to the electors of Northampton, but to the people at large. I believe, if we cared to put to our constituents, apart from any question of confidence in the right hon. Gentleman I see before me, apart from any foreign or other question, a large majority of the people of England, and also of Ireland and Scotland, would say in reply to the appeal—“We will not have among our Rulers one who denies the God who is above.” Sir, on these grounds, because I believe that I am supported by the feeling of the people of England, because I am confident I express the views of that great constituency by whose favour I now stand before you; above all, because if I could assent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere), I should be recreant to my country, my Sovereign, and my God, I give my strike a most fatal blow at Constitutional principles, and a still more fatal blow against civil and religious liberty; and, as a Member of the Liberal Party that had been returned in overwhelming numbers, he should most deeply regret it if the House came to such a conclusion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for the Borough of Northampton, be admitted to make an Affirmation or Declaration, instead of the Oath required by Law."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD, in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That, having regard to the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees, appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72,"

said, that there was no Member of that House, if he excepted the hon. Member for Northampton himself, who did not heartily regret that this question had been raised. So far from having any desire to interrogate anyone as to his religious belief, they should have thought it a subject of special congratulation, and might possibly have entertained the charitable hypothesis that Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions did not continue the same as they had been, if without any notice he had come to the Table and taken the Oath in the ordinary manner. In that case no question would have been raised, and every hon. Gentleman about him would have deprecated any inquisitorial proceedings as to Mr. Bradlaugh's views. But it was impossible not to see that Mr. Bradlaugh's views had been thrust upon the House, and that important distinction must be obvious to everyone. Each man was the keeper of his own conscience, and if he kept it to himself it was his own affair; but if he challenged the House of Commons to say whether he was or was not entitled to take the Oath it was impossible for the House of Commons to shield itself by saying that each man must be guardian of his own conscience. The Members of that House were the guardians of the decency and the decorum of that great Assembly, and the Member for Northampton was now shifting to them the responsibility which he might have kept to himself. He would briefly recapitulate the history of this matter. A question was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman in turn invited the consideration of the House to it. At the instance of the Government a Committee was appointed, and that Committee reported. They had heard something about the Report having been carried by this vote or by that. He was himself unable to understand the attributing of the Report of a Committee which reported by a majority to the vote of any particular Member. The Report was the Report of the Committee. If anybody was to go behind a decision and examine the way in which each Member voted, and proceeded to weigh in the balance the authority of each particular Member, it was obvious that, whether as regarded Courts of Law or that House, the finality of the decision was gone. It was at the instance of Her Majesty's Government that this Committee was appointed, and when the Report was presented to the House one of two courses was open to them. Either Her Majesty's Government might have challenged, if they thought proper, the Report of the Committee, or they might, as they did, follow another course. They thought it right to move for another Committee, in which case the terms of Reference assumed the accuracy of the Report made by the first Committee. And, in truth, when the House discussed at some length the appointment of the second Committee, it was pointed out that it was very desirable to have a discussion on a question of law carried on without heat in a serener and more judicial atmosphere, and that a Committee was the atmosphere in which such a question ought to be debated. While it was assumed that the first Committee had disposed of the question of the Affirmation, the question of the Oath was referred to the second Committee. That question was debated with very considerable animation on each side, and what the Committee thought right they reported; but they were asked to add to the Report a matter which had not been remitted to them; and, in fact, to overrule the decision of the first Committee, the subject matter of the first Committee's decision not being within the preamble of the Reference. He admitted it might be said—"Oh, this is not overruling the legal principle laid down by the first Committee; but this recommendation,

Judge was "satisfied that an oath would not be binding on the conscience." Mr. Bradlaugh claimed as one of those persons to be allowed to make the Affirmation; and he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) held that, when he made that claim, he was as much entitled to be allowed to affirm as any hon. Member who declared himself to be "one of the persons called Quakers." The more he had considered the subject the more convinced he had been that this was the true meaning of the Statute, and that Mr. Bradlaugh ought to have been allowed to affirm without question. But it was said that the first Committee had reported against Mr. Bradlaugh's right to affirm, and that the recommendation of the second Committee was ultra vires, and that it overrode the finding of the first Committee. With all submission, this was not so. The House, no doubt, was accustomed to pay respect to the Reports of its Committees, and it ought to do so. But the House was not always, or necessarily, bound by what a Select Committee had done or recommended. Reports came before them for consideration; and the House, as the ultimate judge, had, in many cases, declined to adopt them. It was asked to do so now by the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Hardinge Giffard) in the case of the second Committee, because that Committee, it was said, had gone beyond the scope of the Reference. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) contended that what the second Committee had done was strictly within the scope of their authority, and did not override the finding of the first Committee. What were the matters referred to the second Committee? They were charged to inquire into the "facts and circumstances" under which Mr. Bradlaugh claimed to be sworn, and to report and advise the House as to the law and the jurisdiction of the House with reference to those "facts and circumstances." Those words, the "facts and circumstances," governed all that followed in the Order of Reference. And what were the facts and circumstances? The Order itself recites them—namely, that Mr. Bradlaugh had claimed to be allowed to affirm, and having been refused, had afterwards claimed to take the Oath. The Order, therefore, opened up the whole question again as to Mr. Bradlaugh's right to affirm, and the right of the House to refuse to allow him to do so. The recommendation of the second Committee pointed out the "facts and circumstances" under which the decision of the first Committee was arrived at. It showed and declared their decision to be, under the circumstances, unsatisfactory. That it was carried by a majority of one, that one being the Chairman's vote, and, considering the serious matter involved, that it was a question of law of great nicety, and that a vast body of professional opinion was at variance with the finding of the first Committee, it was not overriding the judgment of the first Committee, or asking too much of the House to recommend that, if Mr. Bradlaugh presented himself again, and asked to be allowed to affirm, he should "not be prevented from so doing." The issue was a grave one; not for Mr. Bradlaugh only, but for the House itself. If Mr. Bradlaugh were not allowed either to take the Oath or affirm, he was concluded. There was no appeal from the decision of the House. On the other hand, if he were allowed to affirm, and the House was wrong in permitting him to do so, it would be open to anyone to have the question decided by the calm judgment of a Court of Law. The question before the House was a far wider question than that of an individual's right, important as that undoubtedly was. It was not Mr. Bradlaugh's right merely that they were considering; it was the right of every constituency in the Kingdom to return whom they pleased to represent them, whether the person returned was acceptable or not to Members of that House. They had no right to control the constituencies of the Kingdom, and to say that the men they sent here should be men of this or that particular pattern. Arguments had been used during these discussions—indeed, they had been employed that evening by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. R. N. Fowler), the Member for the City of London—that shocked modern opinion. The hon. Member denounces Mr. Bradlaugh as unfit to sit here because of his views on religion. It was by precisely the same kind of argument that Nonconformists, and Catholics and Jews, were formerly kept out of Parliament, and denied civil and political rights. There was not an argument against Mr. Bradlaugh's admission which had not been employed against all and each of these different bound to take—the Oath of Allegiance, the Oath of Supremacy, and the Oath of Abjuration. Alderman Salomons came to the Table and demanded to be sworn on the Old Testament. The Speaker inquired on what ground. He said that was the form binding on his conscience. Accordingly on that statement the Old Testament was handed to him, and he proceeded to take the two Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. He also took the Oath of Abjuration down to the words “on the true faith of a Christian.” He omitted those words, and the Speaker interposed, stating that the Oath had not been taken according to the law. Upon that, debate arose. On that occasion the same suggestion was made which had been made here. It was suggested that the hon. Member might be allowed to sit and vote in the House subject to the penalties he would incur, and in that way the law would be determined. Lord John Russell, the then Prime Minister, protested against any such course being taken; and the then Attorney General, now the Lord Chief Justice of England, pointed out that that was not the proper course to pursue “where the House itself had a duty to perform in respect of the administration of the oath.” The Lord Chief Justice added—

“I cannot agree that the proper course would be to disobey the law in order that it may be seen whether the tribunals of the country would endorse the decision. The suggestion has actually been made that the House should give up its right of jurisdiction over matters that come within it; and, indeed, if the question of penalty were decided by a Court of Law, it could not determine the question whether a Member was entitled to sit and vote in the House, nor warrant the House in shrinking from a duty which the House is bound to perform.”

That seemed to be precisely a case in point. It appeared to him that the Committee, in the recommendation they had made, said what was tantamount to this:—Do what is unlawful, and leave it to the Courts of Justice to say whether it is right or not. If it was unlawful, it did not seem a decent course to permit what had been decided by the Committee to be contrary to law, in order afterwards to have it determined by the Courts of Law whether it was right or wrong. But there was a much more serious question behind. Suppose they permitted Mr. Bradlaugh to make Affirmation, was it quite clear that any

Court of Law could go beyond that? In the course of events he presumed that Mr. Bradlaugh would be sued for penalties, and thereupon he supposed that Gentleman would prove that he was permitted by the House to make an Affirmation. Putting that fact even as a question for a jury, would it not be very pregnant evidence that he was one of those persons in respect of whom the Statute permitted an Affirmation to be made? And how were they going to get beyond that evidence? Mr. Bradlaugh had, on more than one occasion before the Committee, availed himself of his power to decline to answer certain questions, and in an action every presumption would be made in his favour, and not a single question tending to substantiate the action could be put to him if he objected. How could they go behind that? What facts were they to prove? Had they arranged who was to be the plaintiff? Was it all arranged that there was to be a special case stated between the parties? He had not heard of any such arrangement, and, so far as he could gather from the proceedings of the Committee, he very much doubted whether Mr. Bradlaugh was disposed or bound to afford them any information. Was the House going to make a bargain with Mr. Bradlaugh? Was the House going to say to him—“If we allow you to make an Affirmation, will you state the facts in a special case to help us to have the law decided?” But there was a more important question still; for, when the unlawful thing was done, it was provided that the seat should be declared vacant. Who was to decide that question? Was the House to wait until the court of first instance, or peradventure the House of Lords, had decided, before it presumed to exercise its own peculiar function, any interference with which it resented from all other jurisdictions. They had been told they might have an action brought against their own officer for refusing to permit Mr. Bradlaugh to make Affirmation; but the duty was not imposed on Sir Erskine May, but on the Member himself, of taking the Oath or making Affirmation. The section of the statute said—“the Oath shall be solemnly and publicly made and subscribed by every Member” before he took his seat; and the 4th section provided that if any Member without having made and subscribed the Oath should take part in debate or vote he should be subject to a penalty and his seat should be vacated in the same manner as if he were dead. Then they would have this whole debate over again on the question of the issue of the Writ. In these circumstances they were entitled to ask what was the intention of the Government? Were they in favour of the Motion or Amendment which had been placed on the Paper? He admitted that there was a remedy that could be applied. That remedy was legislation—legislation of the kind which was adopted when Sir David Salomons could not take his seat. The House on that occasion, under the leadership of Lord John Russell, positively declined to shrink from its plain straightforward obligations, or still less to be controlled by the action of third parties in Courts of Law. If ever there was an a fortiori case it was the one with which Lord John Russell was then dealing. His Lordship objected to the law as it was laid down by the lawyers. He was taunted again and again by his own followers that he would not allow Sir David Salomons to do that which would raise the question in the Courts of Law. He said—

bodies. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) remembered well how they were employed against the admission of his own community. It was the spirit of such arguments that lighted the fires of Smithfield, and established the Inquisition in Spain. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had, and could have, no kind of sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh or his opinions. He condemned and deplored them. But he held the right of conscience to be the most sacred of all human rights, and whether a man believed much, or little, or nothing at all, rested upon precisely the same common ground, the right of each man to determine for himself in matters of religion. To attempt to limit this right was to deny it altogether. To impose disabilities, or to punish a man, by withholding civil or political rights, because of his opinions, was a power which he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) could not concede to any man, or body of men. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) belonged to a race that had suffered more than any other for the sake of conscience, and, in many parts of the world, they suffered still. He, for one, would never use the rights he enjoyed as an Englishman to exclude another from equal participation in those rights. Least of all would he, because of his own religious convictions, by word or deed, join with those who would invade the sacred domain of conscience, and deny the right of private judgment.

MR. WARTON asked, "Where are we now?" The Attorney General, as representing the Government, had taken credit to himself for accepting the decision of the first Committee; and he wished to know whether it was at the instigation or with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government that the second Committee had appended to its Report the recommendation that Mr. Bradlaugh should be permitted to affirm—a matter which in no way entered into the scope of its inquiry? He hoped, and indeed believed, that the House, and especially the Liberal Members of it, would pause when they considered what a terrible effect would be produced in the country by voting in favour of the Motion which would admit Mr. Bradlaugh to the House. He agreed with the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), who seconded the Amendment, that the question was one of religion, and that if it were put to a vote of the country there would be a far larger majority against the Motion than that which returned the Liberal Party to power at the recent Election. The right hon. Gentlemen he saw opposite him (Mr. Gladstone and Mr. John Bright) were religious men, and he hoped they would not on the present occasion throw their shields over an infidel and a blasphemer. There was an assumption on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters that an infidel had a conscience—an assumption which he denied not only on broad grounds, but on the very derivation of the word, which implied a knowledge of some One with us, or the light of God in our own nature. In conclusion, he begged that every Member of the House who believed in God would vote against the "fool who hath said in his heart there is no God."

MR. WHITBREAD wished to remind hon. Members opposite of a fact which they had apparently forgotten, which was that when the first Committee in reference to this matter was appointed it was distinctly understood that the Report of the Committee was in no sense to decide the question, but was simply to be a means of affording information to the House to enable the general body of Members to arrive at a decision on a very difficult question. Then, again, it was sought to make the Government responsible for the course which had been pursued by the second Committee. Let them not forget that the Leader of the House proposed to appoint as the second Committee the very same Gentlemen who had formed the first. If that course had been followed it was but reasonable to suppose that the Committee would have come to a similar conclusion. But it was at the instigation, and at the express wish of the Leader of the Opposition, that new names were added, and that if a Report different from that anticipated had come out, it was rather hard to throw the responsibility on the Government. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) also based a considerable portion of his argument on the erroneous assumption that the Report of the first Committee had decided the law of the case, but admitted that the question was one of law. If this last proposition were true, which he (Mr. Whitbread) admitted, surely no tribunal could be so competent to decide it as the Law Courts.

But he feared that the question was one which involved a wider issue, and therefore regretted the course into which the House was allowing itself to be led. He was one of those who thought it was wrong to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh taking the Oath when he came to the Table. He, having looked as carefully as he could through the precedents as stated by Sir Erskine May, had not been able to find one which supported the view taken by those who supported the view embodied in the Amendment, and which would prevent a man taking the Oath for which he tendered himself, or, indeed, from submitting himself to any test which the law prescribed. Before the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts it was required that every man selected for a municipal office should take the Holy Sacrament—a much more solemn matter than making an Affirmation; but he knew of no case in which a man who presented himself to take the Sacrament was refused. The whole effect of the precedents before them was this—that when a Member was willing to comply with the Forms of the House as prescribed by law he was not liable to be questioned by any man. It had been said by the learned ex-Solicitor General, as had been stated before by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) the other night, that if Mr. Bradlaugh had come to the Table and asked to be sworn without bringing to the notice of the House his objection to take the Oath, they and the House would have most willingly allowed him to do so. That he considered a very astounding statement. But now they said the conscience of the House was aroused. Was it necessary, then, that the conscience of the House should have a flapper to awaken it to action? Surely the opinions of Mr. Bradlaugh were just as well known before he was elected as they were after he wrote a letter to a newspaper declaring what they were. Yet it was said that the conscience of the House might have slept but for Mr. Bradlaugh's letter and his claim to affirm. For his part, he did not understand a conscience of that kind, and he hoped it was not possessed by a majority of hon. Members. But how was the conscience of the House to be brought into play in the future? If someone who openly avowed opinions like those of Mr. Bradlaugh were returned to the House and, coming to the Table, required to be sworn, was the conscience of the House to be allowed to slumber in that case? It seemed to him that hon. Gentlemen opposite were trying to establish a most painful precedent, because the rule now to be adopted must be applied to future cases. Was the House to say—"We will not raise that question because the Member himself had not raised it?" But what were they going to do in the case of Petitions? Surely the conscience of the House would not slumber when the Clerk at the Table had been called upon to read a long Petition pointing out facts of this kind. He wished to call attention to these considerations, because he did not wish to go behind the simple test which the law prescribed. The test was one for individuals, and the acceptance of it was for individuals alone. He did not think the House was qualified or had the right to go behind the conscience of any man who came forward and expressed his readiness to take the test in the same words as the others and without any addition or qualification. The precedent of Sir David Salomons was a most unfortunate one, as he wanted to omit certain words altogether. It would have been wise not to have raised this question. He did not dispute the power of the House to act in the way proposed. Its powers within its four walls were unlimited, but he did dispute that it was a constitutionally right course; and there was a domain into which he denied its right to enter—the domain of conscience. He felt confident that time would show that it would have been wise not to raise the question. He was asked to set aside every precedent and the history of centuries, and, in a generation which might almost have made its boast that it had lived to see the last shackles cast off conscience, to join in the course proposed by the Amendment. If he had been asked to write off some test, to take some step in furtherance of freedom, he had not such a worship of precedents that he would refuse to do so; but he was asked to take an opposite course, to which he could not consent to be a party.

COLONEL BURNABY could not give his voice in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to come to the Table and make a solemn Affirmation or take the Oath. Oaths were established by God, who, they read, swore by Himself, because He could swear by no greater. He hoped the House would pause before it glided into an error which would reflect, directly or indirectly, on one-seventh of the world's inhabitants—he meant the British Empire. If Mr. Bradlaugh were permitted to take the Affirmation it would pollute the Affirmation now taken by all men who believed in God. There was a remarkable passage in Dean Swift which said—

“A man called to any office of trust is bound by oath to faithfully discharge its duties, and that oath ceases to be valid except in the case of those who believe that a Divine Being exists.”

They all knew that Mr. Bradlaugh did not believe in the existence of a Divine Being; and, therefore, he protested against his being allowed to take an Oath or make an Affirmation which would have no binding effect upon him; and he was glad to hear that there was no precedent for such a course as that. An oath was an affirmation of negation or promise corroborated by attestation of the Divine Being; and he, for one, objected to the air of the House being stained by Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed so to swear or affirm.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he had not brought forward the Motion of which he had given Notice because, among other reasons, it could have no immediate effect, and an Act of Parliament would be required to carry it out. But the more he saw of the discussion the more he was convinced that the course he had proposed was by far the best that could be adopted. All that was required was a solemn pledge of allegiance, and that would be best provided for by being put at the head of the Parliamentary Roll to be signed by every Member. It was his intention to vote for the proposition of the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), because he had a firm conviction that Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled by the law, as it stood, to take his seat. The admirable speech of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) must have convinced the House that it had no right to intervene between Mr. Bradlaugh and his taking the Oath or Affirmation; and he maintained that according to the fair interpretation of the Act, Mr. Bradlaugh was one of the persons permitted by law to make an Affirmation in lieu of an Oath.

Colonel Burnaby

MR. J. G. HUBBARD reminded the House that in every one of the cases which had been cited a scruple to take the Oath had arisen in the mind of the person who objected, and who was subsequently relieved. But that was a totally different thing from the case which unfortunately now occupied the House. He assured the House that hon. Members on his side of it were as fully in favour of religious liberty as hon. Members opposite, and as fully alive to the propriety of not tying people down to one particular form of oath or affirmation. Nobody on his side of the House was disposed to act the part of inquisitor either in connection with morals or religion, and Gentlemen returned to Parliament had up to the present been unchallenged by Members of the Opposition when offering to take the Oath at the Table. In this case, however, they were not permitted to leave unnoticed the person desiring to be enrolled among them; for had not Mr. Bradlaugh first of all declared that the Oath was obnoxious to him, and then placed his opinion on record in his letter printed in the newspapers? He was of opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh's manner of dealing with the question before them was not quite honest and straightforward. They had, in fact, to deal with a person who, in the first place, declared that he could not make a solemn asseveration, but afterwards said that he would make it, in order to obtain his object. Did not such behaviour smack of untruth and gross hypocrisy? He hoped the House would refuse to make itself the accomplice of Mr. Bradlaugh in this matter. The person upon whose behalf they were invited to change the laws of the country, by those who said “Do away with Oaths and Affirmations,” had shown to the House that he disregarded truth, and knew no arbiter but his own will. He contended that, while giving every possible latitude to different religions or persuasions, a civilized country could not permit the abrogation of the ties and obligations which were the only security for the maintenance of order and the observance of truth.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had pushed his case to the length of saying that the law had been definitively declared by the Report of the Select Committee, and that the proper course for the Government now to take would be to introduce new legislation, with the special object of letting Mr. Bradlaugh take his seat. But did the House think the hon. and learned Member would have made that suggestion unless he had a well-founded hope that he and his friends would be able to stop such legislation if it were proposed? He (Sir Henry Jackson) gave him credit for perceiving that the difficulty of the position was such that either side or either Government might not unreasonably shrink from altering the law to meet the particular case; and he asserted that the real question before the House was, not whether some Government at some time or another was to undertake the heroic task of altering the existing law, but whether, according to the law as it stood at present, Mr. Bradlaugh was or was not entitled to come to the Table and make the Affirmation. He was aware that the Select Committee had reported against Mr. Bradlaugh having that right; but he also remembered that, during the debate which led to the appointment of the Committee, no one was louder in his protests that its finding would not be binding on the House than the hon. and learned Member. He (Sir Henry Jackson), like his hon. and learned Friend in the former debate, contended that the House was not bound to follow the Report of that Committee, if it did not commend itself to the judgment of the House. The House need not shrink from the consideration of the whole question, either as one of public policy, or on the narrower ground of the construction of the Act of Parliament. On the broad question of policy, he thought it was remarkable that in the year 1880 hon. Members of the House should be found boldly asserting that a new fetter should be imposed on the ground of religious belief or of the absence of religious belief, and actually avowing their determination to refuse a man the right of sitting in that House on such grounds. When Parliament had enacted that the fact of a witness not entertaining any religious belief should no longer be an impediment to the reception of his evidence in the most important questions involving life and death, social status, character, or property, surely it was no longer possible to refuse to apply the same principle to hon. Members of that House. His own feeling always was that the greater the value attached to the obligation of an oath, the greater was the danger of diminishing by contrast the value attaching to a man's simple word. But that was a wide question, into which it was not necessary to enter. For, in fact, the Legislature had already determined the question with which the House was then concerned. What was the object of the Parliamentary Oath as required by the Statute of 1866? For whose benefit was it intended? For that of the House? Was it to be in the nature of a test? Surely not. Its intention was to assure the Queen to the extent to which an Oath would give such assurance that every person taking his seat in the House should promise to bear her true allegiance according to the law. It was intended for the benefit of the Sovereign, and she alone was entitled to claim the benefit of the Oath. It was never intended to be a test, social or religious, for admission into the House. It was assumed by the Legislature that the majority of hon. Members would take the Oath; but it provided for the case of subjects of the Queen who, desirous of giving her true allegiance, might yet shrink from taking the Oath. The result, therefore, of preventing any Member from either making the Affirmation or taking the Oath, would be to deprive the Sovereign of a Declaration of Allegiance proffered by a subject elected as a Member of the Body appointed by the Constitution for the purpose of legislating for the Realm, and obviously the more doubtful the allegiance of any particular subject, the more important to the Sovereign would be the declaration of that allegiance by such a subject. The particular case then before the House had not before arisen. He had never thought that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to take the Oath; but he had all along held the opinion which he had expressed in the Select Committee, that he should be allowed to affirm. He thought the Oath excluded the Affirmation and the Affirmation the Oath; but one or other must be available for every elected Member. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston had said that the second Committee had taken an improper course in advising the House to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to do what he called break the law in order to enable a legal tri-

His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston had said that the second Committee had taken an improper course in advising the House to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to do what he called break the law in order to enable a legal tribunal to give its decision on the question. But he (Sir Henry Jackson) ventured to say that the second Committee had, upon a more mature consideration of the question as a whole, come to the conclusion that the first Committee had arrived at an erroneous result, and that what they recommended to be done would be to obey and not to break the law. Did anyone seriously believe that the Legislature intended any such consequence as that a man should neither be allowed to take the Oath nor to affirm? Even his hon. and learned Friend had not ventured to say that, but had said that that question was arguable. It was difficult to imagine any question which a lawyer would admit to be incapable of argument. But supposing that the point were doubtful, or even that on the strict construction of the Statute a man required either to take the Oath or to Affirm, could do neither one nor the other, was it not evident that such a result was simply a casus omissus? After what had occurred with respect to the Rothschilds and Salomons of a former generation, it could never have been intended that anyone should be excluded from that House on the ground of his religious opinions. The wording of the Act of Parliament was so clearly prospective and elastic that one could not doubt that the Legislature thought that every possible case which could arise had been met, and that it intended to enact by words comprehending every person who, by reason of religious convictions, or absence of religious convictions, had been theretofore debarred from giving testimony in a Court of Justice, but who, by past or future legislation, was, or might be, relieved from that bar; that in the future every person so relieved from taking an oath in a Court of Justice should in like manner be relieved in that House, and if he objected to taking an Oath might at once come into the alternative category and take his seat in the House by making an Affirmation and not by taking the Oath. He maintained that whether they looked upon this matter as a question of public policy, or as one simply of the construction of the Act of Parliament, it was right that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm. He had been struck with, and thought it only right to bear testimony to, the candid manner in which Mr. Bradlaugh had given his evidence before the

Sir Henry Jackson

Select Committee. For his own part, he had no hesitation in saying, according to the best judgment he could form, that if Mr. Bradlaugh was allowed to make Affirmation, he would not only not be breaking the law, but he would be obeying it. If the law allowed Mr. Bradlaugh to make Affirmation in a Court of Justice no sound reason could be urged for refusing him that privilege in the House of Commons.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry Jackson), with his usual ingenuity, had tried to gloss over the profoundly illogical position in which the Report of the Committee had placed them. The House was not now confronted by a single difficulty; it had to deal with two distinct difficulties, which, though depending on each other, had a different origin and should be treated differently. There was the difficulty created by the perverse mental conformation of Mr. Bradlaugh, owing to which he tried to make his own admission to that House as difficult as possible by way of testing extreme conclusions; while the other difficulty was that in which they had been landed by the rash cowardice or cowardly rashness of the last Committee that sat. That Committee had a wide field thrown open to it; but, not satisfied with that, it went beyond the draft Report submitted by the Chairman, and in doing so it travelled over perfectly irrelevant ground. It invited the House to bring down a Deus ex machinâ—the beneficent divinity of the Greek drama—in order to settle the question. That Deus ex machinâ was a common informer. It invited the House to invite Mr. Bradlaugh to go to the Table and to do that which the first Committee said he should not do—to make an Affirmation—in order that an action might be brought against Mr. Bradlaugh. That was a roundabout, contemptible way of meeting the difficulty. He had seen such extraordinary things that Session that he came to be surprised at nothing. They had been treated to many scenes, like the transformation in a pantomime; they had clauses turned into Bills, and Bills brought in without names; but this proposal of the Committee—a supremely ridiculous, contemptible, and unworthy conclusion—invited that unfortunate man, the still unseated Member for Northampton, to subject himself to a harassing prosecution and a heavy fine, beside the loss of the seat to which he had been elected, all, forsooth, to try a legal point. That was the conclusion to which they were invited; but it was so supremely contemptible and unworthy of the matter, that he (Mr. Beresford Hope) shrunk from its adoption. As to precedents, there were none, and why? Because no man ever came forward to put himself in the position in which Mr. Bradlaugh had placed himself. When Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table he made his first clever move in a deep game, or he made his first blunder. He made two appearances before the Committee, and he was listened to attentively; and the object of his second appearance became plain—he saw that he had got into the meshes of the Affirmation Act. Then, again, there was Mr. Bradlaugh's own letter, in which he explained why, and how, and in what sense he would take the Oath. The Committee unanimously called upon Mr. Bradlaugh to produce the letter. The hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry had passed a warm eulogium on Mr. Bradlaugh's candour before the Committee; but he (Mr. Beresford Hope) must point out that Mr. Bradlaugh struggled against the production of that letter. ["No, no!"] The room had to be cleared, and a Resolution put, and then Mr. Bradlaugh had the sense to produce the letter. But Mr. Bradlaugh wished to exclude everything outside of that House. He should not read passages from the letter to the House; he would not do it the ill compliment of assuming that these passages were not ringing in their ears. He made no doubt that an Affirmation would be as solemn and equally binding on Mr. Bradlaugh as an Oath. He quite believed that. Therefore the case stood thus—Mr. Bradlaugh was self-excluded from the Affirmation, and self-excluded also from the Oath. Some hon. Gentlemen had ingenuously suggested that the passing of a Bradlaugh Relief Act would be a troublesome, a lengthy, and an uncertain process; and, as the great object was the bringing in of Mr. Bradlaugh, the only alternative was that the House of Commons should make itself an accomplice to a possible breach of the law, conspiring to put Mr. Bradlaugh in a position which would make him either a Member of Parliament or a man who was heavily amerced and who lost his seat. And why were they to do all that? They had heard much of the right of the constituencies to return whom they liked. He granted that as a general principle; but then it must be remembered that a fallacy often lay under a general principle: Latet dolus in generali-bus. And if that was true in any case it was true in this matter. The constituency had power to return to the House whom they pleased; but the House fenced that power with the condition that the man so returned should be qualified to sit. A minor, for instance, might make a better Member than many men of full age; but the House firmly refused to let him take his seat. Again, an alien who was not naturalized might be the most eminent statesman in the world; but the House sternly refused to let him take his seat. Their more recent legislation had not taken away restrictions, but had multiplied them. Every morning they looked at the election column of The Times to see who was out that day. And what was the meaning of that? It was that men mostly reported by the Judges to be men of high honour, of high integrity, many of them well fitted to be in that House, had, by the misconduct of two or three blackguards acting against their wishes and orders, been made unconscious accomplices in acts of bribery which voided the election. They might have been returned by a majority of 1,000; yet if but one such act of bribery was proved, the 999 other votes went for nothing. The majesty of the law and the dignity of Parliament had to be vindicated. The constituency might tear their hair at the loss of a cherished Representative, but out he went. That was an evidence that the general principle that the constituency could choose whom it liked was not an absolute and irrefragable rule. The House of Commons had declared that the effect of an act of bribery, committed behind a man's back, and against his knowledge or his wish, stripped him of the quality of being a Member. Now, Mr. Bradlaugh, as he (Mr. Beresford Hope) contended, had stripped himself by his own act of the quality of being a Member. When the constituency of Northampton returned him it was to be presumed that they returned him as a man who was ready and willing to go through the process which the law recognized as necessary to enable him to sit for that borough. And what had he done? He had shut the door against himself by his appearances and his acts in that House, by his letter to the newspapers, by his silence in one place and his utterances in another. He had disqualified himself from either affirming or swearing—the only two doors of entrance into that House. He had more absolutely disqualified himself than the Members of various boroughs with whose unhappy fate they all so deeply sympathized; and it would be just as logical to rehabilitate the Members for Canterbury, Gravesend, Wallingford, and so forth, as to try, either by a conspiracy with the informer or by a brand-new Act of Parliament, to seat the self-disqualified Member for Northampton. No doubt it was to be regretted that Northampton should be deprived of one of its Representatives; but there were some things of even greater importance than the satisfaction of that constituency. There were the honour of Parliament and the moral sense of Parliament to be considered; and rather than that honour should be tarnished and that moral sense blunted, it would be ten thousand times better that Northampton should remain unsatisfied.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that with reference to the grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope) assumed to be the defender of Christianity in the case now before the House, he (Mr. Hopwood) had no doubt he had opposed on the same grounds the admission of Dissenters to Parliament.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE explained that the hon. and learned Gentleman was in error. He was only 8 years old when the Test and Corporation Act was repealed.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the right hon. Gentleman had lived a long life since and had not learned much, whilst he had forgotten less. There was a time when the Christianity which the right hon. Gentleman claimed to represent would have kept out the Jews, and even have burned them. With regard to Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct before the Committee in reference to his letter to the newspapers, he (Mr. Hopwood) maintained, in opposition to the right hon. Gentleman, that Mr. Bradlaugh had pursued a justifiable and even a manly course. Mr. Bradlaugh said that they ought not to judge him by anything except that which had taken place in the House, and had explained that his letter to the newspapers was an extra-Parliamentary utterance, written in consequence of the many misrepresentations to which he had been subject, and which were the most severe, cruel, and abominable that it had been his (Mr. Hopwood's) lot to hear spoken in that House of an absent man. Questions might be asked as to his own consistency. When acting on the first Special Committee, he formed the opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh had no right to make an Affirmation. He still said so; but now he was convinced that his single vote did Mr. Bradlaugh an injustice, inasmuch as the latter had a right to test legally the question at issue. He, therefore, now shrank from the responsibility of preventing by his single vote that Gentleman from trying the question of his right before a legal tribunal. He entertained a strong feeling that the hon. Member had a legal right to take the Oath, for it was admitted that no one was legally entitled to administer it; and, therefore, no one had a right to object to its being taken. The precedent which it was sought to set would justify an inquiry into the religious belief or fitness of the hon. Members for Greenwich, Portsmouth, or any other hon. Gentleman who might present themselves to take the Oath, and if they did so, it would enable hon. Members to say—"I ask to know the attitude of that man's mind; I don't believe he can take the Oath conscientiously." ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite could not say that before Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table they did not know his opinions; and yet they now said that if he had not thrust those opinions on the House they would not have objected to his taking the Oath. In other words, they said—"Mr. Bradlaugh, if you had come to the Table with a lie on your lips, we would have allowed you to be sworn." ["No, no!"] He (Mr. Hopwood) challenged any man to say that if Mr. Bradlaugh had presented himself to take the Oath anyone would have got up and said—"That man is a blasphemer." He declined to believe in the sincerity of an assertion which amounted to a declaration that hon. Gentlemen opposite would have tacitly assented to what they regarded as an act of blasphemy. He

the Government had failed in its duty in not taking action in the matter. The Government had had no opportunity of taking action. The day after the Committee had agreed to its Report, Mr. Bradlaugh withdrew his claim to make an Affirmation and applied to take the Oath. Fresh circumstances thus immediately arose, and fresh considerations had to be applied. It was impossible that there should be dissent on the part of the Government from the opinion of the first Committee, which was merely to advise the House, and which no one had attempted to act upon. It was in the year 1562 that an Oath was first imposed, and then it was intended, not as a religious test, but to mark that the Sovereign of the Realm, and not the Pope, was the head of the Church. The tendency of recent legislation as to the taking of oaths in Courts of Justice had been to make concessions. In 1854 all persons who objected to take an oath as being repugnant to their religious belief were allowed to affirm; and in 1868 another important advance was made, as then everybody who could assert that the taking of an oath was not binding on his conscience was permitted to make an affirmation. Meanwhile Parliament had done with regard to itself what it had already effected with reference to Courts of Law. It had allowed Quakers and others to make an Affirmation. As to the class of persons who were entitled to affirm, it appeared to him that the 4th section of the Act of 1866 provided, in effect, that the same power to make an affirmation which was given to witnesses in Courts of Justice should be extended to Affirmations made in the House, and the class of persons who were to exercise that power were those who, on ordinary occasions, when called upon to take an oath, might be entitled to affirm in place of it. He could not understand why full effect should not be given to a statute which, although a statute of procedure, was also an enabling statute. He could not agree with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) in his narrow construction of the statute. He believed that it was intended by the statute to admit to that House, on making an Affirmation, all those who in any other circumstances were allowed by law to make an affirmation instead of taking an oath. That was his view of the statute, although, doubtless, much might be said in opposition to it. But he did not wish to argue the question, as a technical question, as to the mere construction of the Act. He would not say, in such a matter, that he was necessarily right and that others must be wrong. There had been great difference of opinion on that subject. But the question arose how this House was going to deal with the advice of the Committee? He thought it would be more convenient that the House should follow that advice than shut a Member out of that House. It was notorious that the first Committee appointed by the House to inquire into this question were pretty equally divided in opinion; and if it were insisted that their views ought to be acted upon, he asked whether the opinion of the majority or that of the minority ought to be accepted? He thought there was a fallacy in arguing that the House was about to delegate its functions to a Court of Law. Reference had been made to the difficulty which, it was said, had been created by the precedent of 1851; but, in his (the Attorney General's) opinion, there was none, as the hon. Member on that occasion had refused to take the Oath in form, for he left out the words "on the true faith of a Christian." If there were no doubt about the question they should not ask for a decision of a Court of Law in reference to it. It was because the question was so doubtful, and because lawyers who had made the study of the law their daily occupation could not agree, and because the bulk of the House must find a greater difficulty in determining the question, that it ought to be brought before a tribunal which could pronounce an authoritative decision upon it. He was not seeking to deprive the House of its functions. The Legislature had, in 1866, settled the mode of arriving at a binding decision, and it was too late now to question the propriety of affording an opportunity to the Courts of Law of giving a decision on the question now raised. The Motion did not seek to introduce any mode of procedure, or to establish any new principle. If Mr. Bradlaugh had come to the Table and been allowed, without question, to make an Affirmation, that fact would not have deprived the Courts of Law of jurisdiction over the particular case. If Mr. Speaker had raised no or a desecration. For his (Mr. Arthur O'Connor's) own part, he thought it was of no use, and hoped it would soon be done away with altogether; but in the meantime it subsisted, and the Rules of the House required it. It was prescribed by statute law. Was the hon. Member for Northampton to be allowed to take it? With all respect for the hon. and learned Member who had last spoken (Mr. Hopwood), he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) answered without hesitation in the negative. There were laws above any Rules of the House of Commons, and there were commandments higher than any Act of Parliament. One of these commandments was—"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." That commandment had no sanction from the intelligent will of Mr. Bradlaugh, who attached to it no more importance than he did to the God who gave it; for the hon. Member had proclaimed that, as he did not know God, it could not be binding upon the hon. Member. It was, however, binding on hon. Members who did acknowledge God. He, for one, disclaimed any intention of imputing to Mr. Bradlaugh any thought of taking the name of God in vain. The hon. Member seemed to evince a much keener sense of what was proper and seemly than those who seemed to be ready to insist upon the administration of the Oath, and in whose mouth it would be nothing but a most horrible blasphemy. As Christians they could have no part in such a proceeding. He did not know what would be the issue of this discussion; possibly, when a particular majority was present, the House might then decide to admit Mr. Bradlaugh to the Table; but he trusted that would never be. Of one thing he was certain—that they could not decently, as Members, permit the record of such a proceeding to appear on the Journals of the House. If, however, it should be so, he, for one, would call upon the majority of those who sat upon that (the Opposition) side of the House, and who were still Christians; he would also appeal to the hon. Member who had spoken so well as the worthy representative of an ancient people, to whom the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was sacred—he would appeal to them all to wash their hands of all complicity in this transaction. He might likewise appeal personally to the Speaker, if it should be decided to admit Mr. Bradlaugh to the Oath, to go through the empty formality of taking an Oath which he really could not take then—when the hon. Member did come to the Table, he trusted that the Speaker would allow him (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) and those who agreed with him sufficient time to withdraw from the House, that they might not be made even involuntary witnesses to an act which would be a scandalous and flagrant violation of the laws of God.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would remind the last speaker (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) that the question before them was not whether Mr. Bradlaugh was to be admitted to take the Oath; the question was whether Mr. Bradlaugh should or should not be allowed to make an Affirmation. He wished to deal with a few of the considerations which arose in connection with that question, some of which had been referred to by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard). His hon. and learned Friend had assumed that there had been a determination by the first Committee of what was the existing law on the subject. He had said, over and over again in the course of his speech, that the law had been decided by that Committee, and had protested against the House reversing the decision arrived at by the Committee. He (the Attorney General), however, must remind hon. Members that when the Reference was made to the first Committee, it was agreed, on all sides of the House, that that Committee should determine nothing. He would not quote his own words; but he had, before the appointment of the Committee, said that the Committee was to decide nothing, and that the House had not delegated its functions. But he would refer to what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend himself, who had agreed to the appointment of the Committee on the terms that it should have no power to determine anything, but should be appointed only to facilitate the proceedings of the House, with whom must rest the ultimate decision. That ultimate decision was now to be given by the House. The opinion of the first Committee now for the first time came before the House, by way of advice only, and the House had to form its own judgment. It had been said that

cluded from the House, but so would every other person who, from conscientious and religious scruples, however deep and sincere, declined to take an oath, if he were not a Quaker, or Moravian, or Separatist. There was no escape from that position, although it was a result at which he did not think they would willingly arrive; and he hoped, therefore, the Amendment would not be sanctioned by the House. By the law, as it at present stood, a person objecting to take the oath in a Court of Justice might substitute an affirmation for it; and he saw no reason why the House should not allow hon. Members who held similar objections to make an Affirmation of Allegiance. From the first to the last of this troublesome question he had endeavoured to determine the bare legal rights of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who claimed to take his seat; and he had come to the conclusion that the hon. Member could not take the Oath, and that opinion was framed principally upon the ground that he was a person entitled to make the Affirmation because the Oath was not binding on his conscience. It was because he thought so then, and thought so still, that he felt he should be acting perfectly consistently in asking the House to accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to make an Affirmation.

Mr. GRANTHAM said, he would admit that there was considerable difficulty in the question now before the House, but it had been greatly increased by the haste with which they had proceeded. The House had, in a hasty manner, delegated its opinion, if not its power, to the first Committee, of which he (Mr. Grantham) was a Member. Then the Committee had been called together the day following their appointment, and without proper time to give the matter due consideration; and yet he ventured to say there was not a single Member of that Committee who voted in the majority who had seen the slightest reason to change the opinion he then formed, or to doubt for a moment that that opinion was right. At the same time, he had no doubt that the opinions of those who voted on the other side were equally conscientious. He was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) state that the Committee now entertained a different view, in consequence of the difficulties in which the House was involved. It was the old story that hard cases made bad law, and if they were to adopt that principle the House would soon become the laughing-stock of the world. It was not necessary by a side wind to get over a difficulty which had been created, however great that difficulty might be. It was idle to say that nothing had been done by the House to accept the deliberations of that Committee; for it had been intended to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath, and that was on the opinion that they were bound by the opinion of the first Committee. Then the second Committee was appointed, and he protested against the recommendation they had made as not being within the range of their inquiry. The duty of the Committee was not to go beyond the ambit of their Reference. It was their duty to act on the Reference made to them, and not to venture upon making suggestions, which might not be approved of, on the idea that they might get the House out of a difficulty. He thought the House itself was capable of dealing with the difficulties which arose in the course of its business without getting rid of them by the back door of a Court of Law; and unless Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to Affirm, there was only one course open. The House must deal with the case, be it as a casus omisus. No one had ever yet attempted to come into the House as a professed Atheist, and it ought, therefore, to have the courage of its opinions, whatever they might be, and say, by Act of Parliament to be brought in on the authority of the Government, that Members should or should not be admitted without reference to their religious opinions. That would be a fair and open way of dealing with the question, and he was very much surprised that the Government had not had the courage of the opinions of those hon. Members who had spoken, because they went the length of arguing that any hon. Member should be entitled to enter the House without being debarred by his opinions. He was surprised at the argument of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), that the House had denuded itself of its power by delegating it to Courts of Law. The House had never divested itself of its question as to Mr. Bradlaugh's right to affirm, that fact would not have interfered with the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law. Let the House remember how the question arose. By the Act of 1866 every person was prima facie entitled to take an oath; and if he sat or voted in the House without taking the Oath, he was liable to penalties. Well, how could such person excuse himself? The only way he could do so was by saying that being a person entitled to make an affirmation under the 4th section of the Act, he had affirmed in place of taking the Oath. He was thus enabled to avoid the penalty he would otherwise have incurred for not having fulfilled the primary obligation of the statute. And what would he have to prove in order to do so? He would have to prove affirmatively that he was a person who, for the time being, was entitled, to make an affirmation instead of taking an oath. Whether he was entitled to do so within the walls of Parliament was a question over which the Courts of Law had jurisdiction; and they were not, by the Motion now before the House, unduly yielding to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law or overruling the authority of Parliament. There was absolute power given by the statute to the Courts of Law to determine whether the Oath should have been taken, and whether, if it had not been, the excuse for making an Affirmation instead was valid. Therefore, while he admitted that the question was one worthy of the consideration of a Committee of the House of Commons, he could conceive no difficulty in adopting the course which was recommended in the Motion before them. They should remember, that whether they allowed Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath or make an Affirmation, they would not finally determine the question. If, by a Resolution of the House, they stated that Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to affirm instead of taking the Oath, that would, in one sense, be a procedure of the House; but it would not relieve him from penalties, if he were liable to them under the statute. If the statute said that the Oath should be taken—a particular case not being exempted—then that statutory obligation could not be altered by a Resolution of the House of Commons. But it was said that, by its Resolution, the House would grant to Mr. Bradlaugh a privilege which he did not possess. They would grant him no such privilege. If he had the right, he had it only as a statutory right, one conferred on him by the 4th section of the Act, and they could not interfere with it if he were so entitled to it. Mr. Bradlaugh had a claim of privilege to make—he had no one to make it to. It was, if anything, his right, and they were only affording him that clear abstract right of action which was given him by the statute; therefore, it was a perfect fallacy to say that they were dealing with a claim to which they might object if they thought proper. His hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had protested against the question being considered on the recommendation of the Committee. It was not so brought under the consideration of the House. If the Committee had made no such recommendation, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would have been equally within his right in submitting the Motion to the House, and it would have been submitted on the ground it had been that evening. The Committee had determined that, under the circumstances, the Oath ought not to be administered to Mr. Bradlaugh, because it would not be binding on his conscience, and that, therefore, he was precisely the person who ought to be allowed to affirm. ["Oh, oh!"] That was a perfectly consistent view of the question. A Member of the House was only entitled to affirm if an Oath was not binding on his conscience. On that ground the Committee refused to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath; but, at the same time, they expressed the opinion that he should be allowed to affirm, because he could not take the Oath, and, therefore, he had a right to affirm. They came to the conclusion that the common-law right of every Member to take his seat ought not to be taken away from Mr. Bradlaugh; and, as he could not take the Oath, they said he ought to be allowed to affirm—leaving the question of penalties, which remained to the determination of a Court of Law. Let him point out to those Members of the House who were discussing this question, not upon the merits of the case or as a matter of principle, but rather with reference to their views of Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions, that if the Report of the first Committee was to be a final decision, the result would be that not only would Mr. Bradlaugh be excluded from the House, but so would every other person who, from conscientious and religious scruples, however deep and sincere, declined to take an oath, if he were not a Quaker, or Moravian, or Separatist. There was no escape from that position, although it was a result at which he did not think they would willingly arrive; and he hoped, therefore, the Amendment would not be sanctioned by the House. By the law, as it at present stood, a person objecting to take the oath in a Court of Justice might substitute an affirmation for it; and he saw no reason why the House should not allow hon. He was surprised at the argument of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), that the House had denuded itself of its power by delegating it to Courts of Law. The House had never divested itself of its power. A Judge might take on himself to allow children or lunatics to affirm; but no man could come into that House and seek to affirm merely because a Court of Law had allowed him to affirm. That was the fallacy which ran through the whole of the speech of his hon. and learned Friend. Through all the debates which had occurred on the question of the Parliamentary Oath, the religious character of the Act had been maintained. There was not a word to show that at any time the House had contemplated the admission within its walls of persons of no religious faith whatever. The language of Sir George Grey's Act, to which so much reference had been made—namely, "or other persons for the time being by law permitted to make an affirmation"—clearly pointed not to persons of Mr. Bradlaugh's stamp, but to all those to whom relief had at different times been extended on religious or conscientious grounds. It was a phrase which conveniently summed them up, and he thought his hon. and learned Friend, in the interpretation he had given of the section, must have overlooked its wording. Such an extensive interpretation as the hon. Member for Northampton now claimed for those words never seemed to have suggested itself to the Parliament of the day at all. Then, the occurrence of the words "presiding Judge" in Mr. Justice Denman's Act, clearly indicated that the making of an affirmation in lieu of an oath was limited to Courts of Law alone, and had no reference to that House. The question now raised was one of vast importance, and ought not to be settled in the indirect and unsatisfactory way suggested by the second Committee. No doubt, the tendency of the day was to do away with barriers of all kinds to religious faith or disbelief, and it might be that a time would come when the ceremony of admission to that House would be shorn of its religious character altogether. But, whatever the ultimate issue might be, the question was one which ought to be boldly grappled with; it was one for the majority of that House to settle, and not for a Court of Law, which might be placed in the embarrassing position of being in conflict with that House. He ventured to suggest that there would be very great difficulty indeed in having this question decided in the Law Courts. It was not, in fact, at all clear that the Courts of Law could impose penalties on a person who came to that House and affirmed under the Resolution which had been proposed to-night. That Resolution was not in any way identified with the opinion of the first Committee, nor did it suggest that in consequence of the Report of the second Committee it was desirable that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm. It was because these proceedings had from the first been hastily taken, in order to get over the difficulty, that he must protest against the passing of such a Resolution as was now under discussion.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: Sir, the House has now to deal with two questions of very great importance. One is a legal question, and the other a constitutional one, and on each of these points I wish to offer a few brief remarks. The legal question is embodied in the Resolution of the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and the constitutional question has been very ably stated by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. The first of these questions, being a legal one, must be solved by every proper construction which can be put on certain Acts of Parliament. There are three classes of Acts which are immediately concerned in this question. First, there are the Acts relating to the promissory Oath of Allegiance, which is now required to be taken by all the great Officers of State, by the Judges of the land, and by Members of both Houses of Parliament, as a condition precedent to their being allowed to take their seats. It is a promissory Oath of great importance, and intended to be of great importance. The second class of Acts is of a totally different kind. It is the class of Acts relating to the admissibility of evidence, and to that alone. The third class of Acts are exceptional Acts. They are Acts which, in consideration of religious conviction and religious belief, dispense with the necessity of the oath being taken and allow an affirmation to be taken in its stead. These are the three classes of Acts which we must bear in mind upon every part of this case, and then we must see, by reference to the Acts, what is the interpretation we are to put upon them. The first class of Acts, although repealed in many instances, retained the promissory Oath of Allegiance in the three cases to which I have referred, because it was regarded as a matter of momentous importance that persons should not assume high public offices or take a seat in Parliament except with a full recognition of the solemnity of the duties they would have to discharge. I would ask the House to consider the construction of that Act of Parliament. It begins by a Preamble which recites that one uniform Oath shall be taken by every Member. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General argued as if the principal object of the Act was contained in the 4th section; but it is the 3rd section which says that every Member of both Houses of Parliament must take that promissory Oath of Allegiance before he can take his seat at the beginning of every new Parliament. The exception speaks only of the person who objects to take the Oath on religious grounds, and who is there put on a level with the man who takes the Oath, because he equally recognizes a solemn religious obligation. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) pointed to the construction of the 4th section of the Act, and in that he has been followed by my hon. and learned Friend; but may I remind him that, bearing in mind other Acts of Parliament, I think he has imported into that 4th section words which are not there? The exception mentioned applies specifically only to Quakers, and the words "every other person permitted by law for the time being to affirm," were intended to include Moravians and Separatists and other religious persons who might claim the benefit of the Act. Then I turn to the other Act. Every line of it refers to Courts of Justice, and to Courts of Justice alone, which allow the particular form in which the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) desires to affirm. In every criminal and civil proceeding, in every Court where the person satisfies the presiding Judge for the purposes of justice that his oath is not binding upon him, there, in order to promote the administration of justice, you make the exception; but not in any other case. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has omitted one thing that seems to me to be important—namely, that in all cases where the exception is allowed, with the exception of the Quaker, who is assumed to object to an oath, it is always stated in some form or another that the person desiring to affirm objects from religious motives to an oath; and, not only that, but in every one of these cases, the form of the affirmation is distinctly embodied in the Act of Parliament that allows it. Now, what is the form of the affirmation in the Evidence Amendment Acts? It is this—

"I, A.B., do solemnly and truly declare that the evidence I give shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

You cannot substitute another form of affirmation, unless you are authorized by an Act of Parliament to do so; and this very Act of Parliament distinctly points out the form in which an affirmation is to be made. I feel very strongly that the law, to my mind, is so clear on this one point, that I cannot do otherwise than vote against the Motion. Now, for the other point. I wish to appeal to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to consider the consequences that will follow the adoption of the Motion which is now made, with the intention, or rather with the understanding, that the hon. Member for Northampton shall be allowed to come to the Table and affirm. The consequence, in the first place, is that he comes into the House, and a great many hon. Members think it very doubtful whether he ought to do so; in the second place, every time he sits and votes in this House he is liable to a penalty of £500. Now, how long is this to go on, and how many penalties is he to incur? Is the House knowingly to sanction and encourage the hon. Member for Northampton when he takes his seat and incurs hundreds and hundreds of pounds of penalty which, in consequence of the provisions of the House itself, he will be forced to pay? Would anyone think it reasonable that he should not be indemnified if we allow him to sit, after having really promoted the conduct that involves him in these penalties? Then we ought also to consider, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) suggested, what will be the result of moving for these penalties. The defence will be that he was entitled to affirm. Another defence will be that he was acting under the authority of the House, and that the House had the right and the jurisdiction to determine this question—nay, that it was the duty of the House to determine it. Is that a consequence we are prepared to accept? Are we to bring ourselves into collision with the Courts of Law; or are we so incapable of determining what is the true construction to be put upon this Act of Parliament that we are to hand it over to the Courts of Justice, which may take any view irrespective of the point upon which we want to have a decision? I do not like the House to enter into any controversy with the Courts of Law, nor do I think it right that this House should shrink from the duty thrown upon it by Parliament—the statutory obligation to see that its Members are rightly seated. My conviction is very strong. I believe that, legally, the hon. Member cannot sit. I believe that the consequence of his sitting would be injurious to him and to the House, and I cannot support it.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will excuse me if I do not add very much to the strictly legal discussion with which it has been occupied the whole of the evening. If I wanted an excuse for avoiding much legal argument in what I have to say, I think I should have it abundantly in pointing to the different legal opinions which have been expressed to-night and on former occasions, and in the Committees on this question. It is evidently a matter which, if left to the lawyers, the lawyers would be unable to dispose of. Therefore, I shall not attempt to add an opinion which is not legal to the many legal opinions which we have had. But I should like to put two or three views to the House, which a man not brought up to the law may reasonably entertain, and, perhaps, as reasonably express. I must say, in the first place, that I think the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was in his right place to-night when asking the House to consider the Resolution he has brought before it. He is here the Representative of a large constituency, whose choice is called in question—not the choice with regard to him, but the choice with regard to his Colleague, the hon. Member associated with him in the representation of that large constituency, but whose right to take his seat in this House has been contested by certain hon. Members, who obviously have no objection except that his religious opinions—[“No, no!” “Irreligious!”]—or his opinions on religion differed from theirs. I am quite sure no one who heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City (Mr. Hubbard), or the right hon. and learned Member who spoke last from that Bench, will doubt for a moment the accuracy of what I say. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman had expounded all his legal arguments, then he turned to this heavier and graver question; and whoever listened to his speech will feel that he is acting very much upon his strong opinion with regard to that branch of the subject.

MR. HUBBARD: I deny the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's representation of my speech.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I recommend the House to read to-morrow what the right hon. Gentleman has said to-night; I have paid great attention to everything that he has said. Now, what is the simple question before us? It is agreed, I suppose, by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the electors of Northampton had a right to a free selection of a Member to represent them in this House. Nobody can say, I presume, that Mr. Bradlaugh was not legally entitled to offer himself as a candidate, or that the electors of Northampton were not legally entitled to elect him. If that be true of the constituency it must also be true of the Representative, that he is duly and legally chosen to sit in the House of Commons. Well, he comes to this Table and finds—or he has found before he comes—that some hon. Members—the majority—take an Oath, the Oath of Allegiance, and that some Members—only a small minority—take or make an Affirmation to a somewhat similar effect. There are a great many hon. Members of this House who take the Oath and greatly dislike it. [“No, no!”] That I know to a certainty—and it is open to any hon. Member, on coming to the Table, to propose to take either the one or the other. [“No, no!”] It may be that the Affirmation is so limited that many persons may not be allowed to take it. Mr. Bradlaugh did not come to the House and refuse to take the Oath. He made no such refusal. Probably if he had known, if he had had any suspicion, that the Affirmation would be refused to him, he would have taken the Oath as other

hon. Members take it—very much, I am afraid, as a matter of form. [“No, no!” “Withdraw!”] If any person thinks it necessary to deny that, I will not contest it. I must, however, say myself I know nothing more irreverent than the manner in which great numbers of Members take the Oath on this floor. Well, Mr. Bradlaugh comes here; he does not refuse to take the Oath—that is not the question; but he says he would prefer to make the Affirmation, as he has been allowed to make affirmations on most important questions in many of the High Courts of Justice in this country. And as he knows that a considerable number of persons make an Affirmation at this Table, he very naturally supposes he may do the same, and, preferring the Affirmation to the Oath, he communicates his view to the Clerk at the Table or to Mr. Speaker, and proposes to make an Affirmation. Bear in mind that he did not refuse to swear; that was not the question put to him—he proposed to make the Affirmation. On that occasion the Speaker entertained a doubt whether he was one of those persons who might be permitted to affirm. The Speaker’s doubt was not as to whether Mr. Bradlaugh could swear, but as to whether he could Affirm; and having that sort of doubt which seems to enter the minds of lawyers on both sides of the House, the Speaker referred the matter to the House, and he did not chose to decide it for himself. Well, it would have saved us a great deal of trouble, Sir, if you had decided it for yourself. But no one can call in question your judgment. No doubt it was most conscientious, and possibly it may have been most wise. The question having been thus referred to the House, there was considerable debate and a good deal of heat and temper—at least, I judged so from the reports, for I was not in the House that evening. It was decided at last that a Committee should be appointed to consider the question and go through it more carefully and calmly than would be likely to be done by having the matter settled at once by debate and division in this House. A Committee of 19 Members was chosen. The Committee discussed this question, I think, only for one day; certainly they did not give to it anything like the amount of care, time, and discussion which was given by the second Committee to the matter submitted to them. The Committee decided by the casting vote of the Chairman. [“No, no!”] You say “No;” but I know that it was so. I have it here. The numbers were Ayes 8 and Noes 8, and thereupon the Chairman declared himself with the Noes. That was the way in which this great question was settled in Committee. I do not say that the decision of the Committee, under such circumstances, should have no weight with the House. On the contrary, I admit its weight, whatever it may be. But, really, if out of 17 there had been 12 or 14 on one side, and four or five or six on the other, a decision of that kind would, probably, have some weight with the House, and it would naturally be entitled to have that weight. I did not agree with a great many things which were said or suggested in the Committee even by some of those with whom I voted. It was understood that Courts of Justice can allow a person like Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm. They can assume, or know, or be told that an oath is not binding upon his conscience, and, therefore, they can enable him to affirm. But the Act which enables him to affirm in a Court of Justice, it is assumed, has not the power to enable him to affirm in this House. And that is the difference, and that is the difficulty. But the fact is, that quite as many lawyers are on one side as on the other. I am not allowed here, I dare say, to mention names; but, besides the eminent lawyers in the House, there are very eminent lawyers outside who take the part of those who voted with the minority in the first Committee, and in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to make the Affirmation. Now, at best, it must be considered—and I will give every weight I can to hon. Gentlemen opposite in their opinions; but still it must be admitted, in view of this difference among intelligent lawyers, that the question is extremely doubtful. I am one of those who take the view, in regard to one of those Acts, that this power, which is given to presiding Judges in Courts, is given to all persons who have the power to administer an oath. Well, no doubt, the House of Commons has the power, both at the Table and in Committees, to administer Oaths. I think, therefore, that the House might fairly agree that the power which was given to Courts of Justice in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh rested with the House also, and that he might, therefore, as legally make an Affirmation here as he could make an affirmation in the High Court of Justice. Well, that decision of the Committee was laid upon the Table, but no action was taken upon it. I think that the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Gifford), and one or two others, have said that was a tacit acknowledgement that we accepted the conclusion of the Committee. The fact is, the Report was only delivered to hon. Members on the very morning of the day on which Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table and proposed to take the Oath. Therefore, there was no time for the House even to consider what should be done in reference to the Report of the first Committee, and so no action on it was taken at all, and it remains as it was, neither accepted by the House nor yet rejected. Well, then, afterwards Mr. Bradlaugh came on that very night to the Table again, and proposed to take the Oath. He had never refused to take it, and had never given the House to understand that he intended to refuse taking it. All that he had done was to tell the House that he should prefer to make an Affirmation, and that he believed it was within the practice and law of Parliament that he should be permitted to make it. Now, being denied the one, what was reasonable he should do if he had no insuperable objection? The course he would take would be naturally this—that he would propose to take the Oath. The one door being closed against him unfortunately, and, as he thought, quite contrary to his rights; then he said—“Looking to the interests of my constituents, for the purpose of which I am sent here, I have no objection to take the Oath which Parliament imposes, and I shall take it exactly as everybody else takes it” — [Cries of “No!” and “Oh!”]—allow me to finish—“from the first word of it to the last;” and, as he stated in the most distinct manner to the Committee, that the Oath, the words that he would pronounce at this Table, would be absolutely binding upon his conscience and upon his honour—just as the words of the Affirmation would have been binding, if he had been permitted to utter them, and just as the words of the Affirmation are binding upon my conscience and upon my honour. I pretend to have no conscience or no honour superior to the conscience and honour of Mr. Bradlaugh. [“Oh!” and “Hear, hear!”] It is no business of mine to set myself up—perhaps it is no business of yours to set yourselves up—as having a conscience and honour superior to that which actuates Mr. Bradlaugh. If you take a different line, I should like some ingenious man among you to tell me where it would lead to. Now, when Mr. Bradlaugh proposed to take the Oath, an hon. Member on the opposite side of the House—the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff)—did what never was done in Parliament in the lifetime of any man here, or I believe within the historic reading of any man—he rose in his place and objected to Mr. Bradlaugh taking the Oath. That is a course which is so unusual that at least, if there be any justification for it, it ought to be clearly and fully set forth. The practice is wholly new. Gentlemen upon the Committee from the opposite side of the House, including the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Spencer Walpole), took some pains to ascertain if there was a shadow of a shade of a precedent for what had been done; but they did not succeed, and nothing was brought before the Committee to show that the course which had been taken had ever been taken before. It was said that, under the circumstances, there was no course open but to refer the matter to a Committee; and again the House referred the question to a Committee—the old Committee, with four new Members upon it. The first Committee consisted of 19 Members, and the second of 23. The opposite Party complained that there were not sufficient lawyers on it, and then more were added. When the question arose of adding other four, it was said that there was not a sufficient Nonconformist representation; but no names of Nonconformists were added. In fact, I never knew such a chaos and want of understanding in any debate in this House as has been shown on the opposite Benches. Then the Committee of 23 met and discussed the question for about seven days, and one day we sat from 1 o'clock to 7 without leaving the room. No question could have been discussed more thoroughly and more honestly. At last the Oath was refused, on a ground which I think is absolutely untenable—although I was in a small minority—that Mr. Bradlaugh had asked to Affirm. It was assumed that, because he asked to Affirm, he had declared that the Oath was not in the smallest degree binding on his conscience. He made no such declaration, and it is, in my opinion, an assumption we have no right to make, that this was his position. He had asked to Affirm, and he had stated, because he had to give some legal justification, that he did so because there were certain Acts referring to the case, and in Courts of Justice these had been sufficient to allow him to affirm. He never said the Oath would not have been binding on his conscience. He said, over and over again, that it would; and I insist now that the House is not just to Mr. Bradlaugh in saying that he could not take the Oath because he had asked to Affirm. I think that is taking an unfair advantage of him that not one of us would like to see taken against himself if he could be in a position at all similar to that which Mr. Bradlaugh is in. It comes to this. That his Oath is declared by the Committee not to be binding, although he himself has constantly asserted the contrary; and that on the ground that his Oath was not binding, it was resolved that he would not be allowed to take the Affirmation, although it would have been permitted to him to do so in a Court of Justice. A right which he has in every Court of Justice in the Kingdom the House of Commons, which is the source and fountain of all our justice, prohibits him from having at its Bar. I think, on these grounds, I am justified in saying and feeling that Mr. Bradlaugh has not had what I should call that favourable and generous justice which the House of Commons is in the habit of according to its Members. Now I come to the question of precedent, and, with regard to that, it is admitted there is no precedent for the course proposed to be taken. There has never been an Inquisition before when a Member has presented himself to take the Oath at the Table. There has never been any Member for Portsmouth in past times so courageous, or any great Party in the House willing to allow a question of this kind to be raised, when any Member came up to the Table to take the Oath of Allegiance. There are no precedents in any of the Courts of Law either in this country or in Scotland, any more than there are in Parliament. In 1833 there certainly was a precedent in the case of Mr. Pease; and though it does not run on all fours with the present case, I will refer to it in order to allude to two opinions that were expressed concerning it. Mr. Pease, as the House well knows, objected to take the Oath, and also to make any Affirmation in which the words of the Oath were included. He would not swear. He had that curious notion that some people have that the New Testament is against swearing at all. He had, at the same time, an objection to make an Affirmation that he would defend the Crown by force of arms. He did these two things being a member of the Body to which I belong, and the House, both in Committee and in the full House, passed unanimously Motions giving him the right to affirm in the manner he desired—namely, that he should be allowed to take the Affirmation instead of the Oath, and that the words of the Oath to which he objected should be omitted from the Affirmation; and in that way he made an Affirmation which has formed a basis of the proceedings of this House ever since towards members of the Body to which, as I have said and as is well known, I belong as did Mr. Pease. Now, I should like to read one passage from the opinion of Mr. Wynn, who in that day was considered the very highest authority on all questions of Order in the House of Commons. It was on that account, no doubt, that he was asked to move the Resolution by which Mr. Pease was admitted to a seat in this House. He says—

“If the case was less clear than it really was, he was of opinion that, in deciding upon it, it would be the duty of the House to lean to the side of the claimant, and in conformity with those Acts of Parliament under which the Affirmation of Quakers was in all Courts and upon all occasions, in criminal as well as in civil cases held to be sufficient, to determine that it was also sufficient here.”—[3 Hansard, xv. 642.]

Now, I would ask the House to act upon the liberal and generous principles which Mr. Wynn recommended to the House. In Courts outside the walls of Parliament established for the administration of justice, Mr. Bradlaugh would have the right to affirm. The one other authority to which I wish to refer, Sir John

Campbell, the Solicitor General of that day, told the House that—

“Originally, by the common law of the land, every person that was duly elected was entitled to take his seat in this House without taking any Oaths whatever.”—[Ibid. 644.]

It is something to know what the common law of the land is, and to know that the common law of the land is in favour of freedom. Sir John Campbell goes back to the Act of the 5th of Elizabeth, before which no Oaths were required to be taken by Members of Parliament, and then he says—

“Now, as that statute, and the other statutes imposing Oaths, were infringements on the common law of the land, and were besides penal statutes, they must be literally and strictly construed, whereas the remedial laws, relaxing such provisions, and so far restoring in a degree the common law right, were to be literally construed.”—[Ibid.]

I appeal to the House—perhaps I ought to appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite; perhaps they are not so full of passion as not to be able to appreciate an argument drawn from authorities like these. [“Oh, oh!”] If they will not listen to me, I shall appeal to those on this side, and to some below the Gangway opposite. I ask them whether Mr. Wynn, a leading and influential Member of the Conservative Party—[“Whig, Whig!”]—well, I sat always on the Liberal side, and saw Mr. Wynn opposite—I ask whether they will not accept this view of Mr. Wynn on a question of this kind? I am not going to argue the question, as it has been argued by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and I will admit, if you like, that there is a doubt. But Mr. Wynn said, if there is a doubt, you ought to lean to the side of the claimant; and Sir John Campbell said the common law of the land is in favour of freedom, and that these remedial laws ought to be construed in a liberal spirit. If you admit that, I think that the course taken in regard to this question shows we have not made much progress during 50 years in regard to a matter of this kind. In the year 1833 the Houses of Parliament had come fresh from the country, fresh also from new constituencies. From that time to this there has been a gradual relaxation; but it is proposed now to establish a new test. It is a test of Theism. [“No, no!”] Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Spencer Walpole) who says “No!” must have forgotten everything that took place in the Committee, and cannot be conscious of his own principles and his own intentions? Why, surely, the object of this Motion is to establish the test of Theism. [“No, no!”] What was the meaning of the words at the end of the Oath, “On the true faith of a Christian,” to which the Jews could not subscribe? That was a test of Christianity by which they were for many years kept out of this House. Now it is proposed by the hon. Member for Portsmouth—it was not proposed from the Front Opposition Bench, because that Bench appears to have abdicated its functions entirely, and has shown, I will not say an abject, but a remarkable submission to Gentlemen who sit in the lower part of the House. I say that you are about to establish a new test of Theism, and to do another thing which it appears to me will be intolerable to the House. You are going to establish two orders of Members in the House of Commons. We are not all to be equal in the future. I may come to the Table and Affirm, and nobody dare ask me any question about my religion, whether Christian, Atheistic, Theistic, or anything else. But if a Member comes to the Table, proposing to take the Oath, and you have certain doubts in regard to him, the hon. Member for Portsmouth can get up and put to him a question. [“No, no!”] Yes, he can. [“No, no!”] I am glad to see that hon. Members opposite are afraid to face the result. [“No, no!”] I say you are about to establish two orders of Members in this House—one, consisting of a small minority, can come up and no man can ask them a question; the other, a large majority, can come here and any Member who wishes to distinguish himself can rise in his place and protest against another hon. Member taking the Oath. [“No, no!”] I put it to the hon. Member for Portsmouth—What would he do in the case of a Comtist or a Positivist? [Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF rose to answer.] I do not want him to answer it now. I remember receiving a pamphlet advocating the getting rid of the idea of a God. That was sent to me on behalf of some persons who may be described in terms that are not appropriate, but who are said to be Positivists or Comtists. I do not know that they

theists at all. I say nothing about it if that pamphlet represents and if any one of them comes into the House, no doubt it will be open—if the House proceeds in the course it is taking—to the hon. Member for Northampton to pursue the line which he has already adopted, and to call in question some men for whom I have the highest respect in regard to everything but their opinions on the question of religion, which I deplore, and in connection with which I can only commiserate for I know that many people have a greater power of belief than others—and I am not one of those—I have often myself passed through many trials—to condemn without sympathy, at least, those who are not able to adopt the views which I myself hold. Now, Sir, one word more. There are Members of this House of different Churches; generally all, I trust, of one religion, the religion which inculcates charity, forbearance, and justice, and even hospitality. There are those who belong to the Roman Catholic Church. I need not remind them of what they and their predecessors have gone through in Ireland in the last 200 or 300 years or more, or how long a time they were kept out of the House, and by the very same kind of arguments which the hon. and learned Member for East Surrey (Mr. Sturges) used. He tells us that for a long time past there has been a relaxation. Yes, no doubt; but did he ever sit among those who promoted those relaxations? I have been here for 37 years, and I have seen these questions discussed over and over again; but I never found that there had come when the Party opposed by Gentlemen who now are, were willing to make those relaxations. They submitted not to arguments, not to sentiments of generosity or justice; they submitted only to a majority which sat on this side of the House. Then there are the Nonconformists. I am told that there are some Unitarians even—but I think it is in the nature of a mistake or of a error—who have some grave doubts as to how they should vote on this occasion. It is occasions like this that try men and try principles. Do you suppose that in times past the Founder of Christianity has required an Oath in this House to defend the religion which He founded? Or do you suppose, now, the Supreme Ruler of the World is interested in the fact that one man sits at this Table and takes His name in vain—may be often in vain—and another is permitted to make an Affirmation reverently and honestly, in which His name is not included? But one is essential for us, the House of Commons representing the English people, which is, to maintain as far as possible the great principles of freedom—freedom of political action and freedom of conscience. The electors, I know not many thousands, of the borough of Northampton have returned two Members to Parliament. You admit the one, and exclude the other. All the constituents of the Kingdom, you may rely upon, will consider this cause is their own. You have heard, for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) told us to-night, that among his constituents there are but few who are supposed in the least to sympathize with many of the opinions of Mr. Bradlaugh. [Laughter.] Well, hon. Gentlemen who know nothing about it laugh at that. I think it very possible finding that Mr. Bradlaugh, in his political opinions was in sympathy with them, those electors so little like his political opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite that they preferred Mr. Bradlaugh, with his political opinions, to some opposing candidates who had presented themselves, and whose religious views might have been entirely orthodox. Now, my belief is that throughout the whole of the great boroughs of the Kingdom you will find the working classes taking part, not with the majority of Commons in excluding Mr. Bradlaugh, but with those who wish him to be permitted to make the Affirmation. I am of that opinion myself. To a certain extent the working people of this country do not care any more for the dogma of Christianity than the upper classes care for the practice of that religion. I wish from my heart that it were so; but of this I am certain, that the course which it is proposed to take in dealing out this rigid measure to the Gentleman honestly, openly, fairly, legally elected by a great constituency, will be productive of great evils, may bring this House into continual conflict with at least one constituency, and may lead us ultimately to the humiliation the House of Commons underwent in connection with another case some 100 years ago. Hon. Members opposite will, I dare say, represent to themselves and to others that they are the defenders of religion, of orthodoxy, of decency, and of I know not what. I am here as the defender of what I believe to be the principles of our Constitution, of the freedom of constituencies to elect, and of the freedom of the elected to sit in Parliament. That freedom which has been so hardly won I do not believe the House of Commons will endeavour to wrest from our constituencies, knowing by what slow steps we have reached the point we have now attained; and I do not believe that, on the recommendation of the hon Member for Portsmouth, they will turn back and deny the principles which have been so dear to them.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that it was with considerable diffidence that he rose to make a few observations, after the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; and he should not wish to do so had it not been that he had felt it to be absolutely necessary that some notice should at once be taken of the principles which the right hon. Gentleman enunciated. They had been told from the other side of the House that they ought to consider this question, to some extent, as a question of law; but the right hon. Gentleman had somewhat ostentatiously told them that he was not going to deal with the law. In that he exercised a wise discretion, because the speech of his right hon. Friend behind him, in its moderation and its calm good sense, would have been extremely difficult for him to answer. But the right hon. Gentleman had gone further, and had indulged in sneers upon everything and everybody connected with views different from his own. He had not only sneered at the motives of those who sat upon this side of the House, but upon the motives of all those hon. Members who intended to vote against the Motion. And when the right hon. Gentleman talked about justice and generosity, he would ask, where was his justice or his generosity? Where was his charity? The right hon. Gentleman was quite right in saying that this was a question which would try a man and his principles, and he had endeavoured, in the course of his speech, to justify the action of Mr. Bradlaugh. He had told them, and deliberately told them, that there were many men in that House who took the Oath as a matter of form; and he had said, further, that Mr. Bradlaugh had come forward to take the Oath just as everyone else came to take it in that House. Now, he ventured in the name of their common Christianity, to repudiate such an idea. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his statement, had entirely misrepresented the position of Mr. Bradlaugh when he came to the Table claiming to be sworn. He could not put the case better than it was put in the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Coventry in the course of the discussion before the Select Committee. That Amendment stated that it was impossible to disregard Mr. Bradlaugh's own action in that matter. In claiming the benefit of the Acts of Parliament permitting Affirmations, he must be taken to have made that claim in accordance with the terms upon which it was allowed by these Acts. On reference to these Acts it would be seen that the only case where they applied was where the Judge was satisfied that an oath would have no binding effect on the conscience of the witness. That, therefore, was the real meaning of the hon. Member for Northampton when he came to the Table of the House and claimed to take the Affirmation instead of the Oath. In the exercise of his discretion, Mr. Speaker had left the matter in the hands of the House, and the question had been referred by the House to a Select Committee appointed on the Motion of the Government. That Committee reported after a very short interval. Their Report was in the hands of hon. Members. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General now said that when the question came on for discussion the Government had had no time to consider or to determine upon what course to take with reference to it. In his opinion, the Government had had just as much time to read the brief Report of the Committee as anyone else. The Report might have been mastered in a few minutes; and that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister accepted its conclusion was shown by the fact that when he moved for the appointment of another Committee, he asserted in the Preamble of his Motion that the first Committee had they might fairly be reminded that even in the darkest times during the French Revolution, in the re-action that followed the enthronement of the Goddess of Reason, it was moved by Robespierre himself in the Assembly, that it was necessary for the Assembly itself to take official cognizance of the existence of a Supreme Being. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster stated that they were proposing a new test of Theism. He would venture to say that they did nothing whatever of that sort. What they did, and what the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend proposed to affirm, was this—that after considering these two Reports they should act upon them, and should say that as the law at present stood, the hon. Member for Northampton was not entitled to take the Oath or to Affirm under the Statutes. The right hon. Gentleman alleged that such a course would make it necessary for them to put questions as to his religious belief to any hon. Member claiming to take the Oath; but, in this case, instead of their putting a question to Mr. Brad-laugh, he had put a question to them.

He had come to the Table of the House and he had asked leave to make an Affirmation for the reasons he had given, and he awaited their answer.
Before adopting the Resolution of the sitting Member for Northampton, they should remember how their action would be interpreted out-of-doors. It would be said that after two Committees had been appointed by the Government, and those Committees had reported that it was not legal for a man who denied the existence of a Supreme Being to take the Oath or to Affirm, he had, in defiance of the law, been admitted by a side wind in the House. He protested altogether against that proceeding, and upon two grounds. In the first place, it appeared to him to involve a complete humiliation of Parliament. It would appear that the Government and the House, after having given the subject much consideration, were unable to arrive at any conclusion whatever upon the subject, but would only leave it to be decided by a Court of Law. What would be the position of the House when the case came before a Court of Law? The Court of Law would decide either that the House had sanctioned an illegal act, with full notice, and with its eyes open, and with the opinions before it of the Committees to whom was specially remitted the consideration of the question; or it would decide that the House had illegally kept out an hon. Member who had a right to be admitted. If either judgment were pronounced, the House would be putting itself in a most undignified position, and especially if, as might happen, the judgment were given as to the legality or illegality of their action by the House of Lords. Again, he objected to this as eminently unfair to Mr. Bradlaugh himself. He came to the Table of the House and asked a plain question, and was entitled to receive a plain answer. He was entitled to be told whether the action he proposed to take was illegal or not. So far as he understood the arguments from the Treasury Bench they did not declare that his act was illegal, but they said that though its legality was doubtful the House ought to admit him. If that contention were right—if either it were illegal to suffer Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm, or if it was so doubtful that the House could not pronounce any opinion upon it, then the proper course was to bring in a Bill and not to leave the matter in a position of such doubtful legality, and yet actually by a Resolution of the House to invite the hon. Member to come in and take his seat. It was said that those who refused to accept this proposal did so because they wanted to bring the House to a dead lock upon this question. Directly the contrary was the case. They did not desire to bring the House to a dead lock; but they said that if Mr. Bradlaugh ought by law to be excluded from taking the Oath, or making an Affirmation, then the House ought to have the courage to say so. If there was a doubt about it, then a Bill ought to be brought forward on the subject upon which the matter could be properly discussed. He objected in the strongest possible way to the course now attempted to be forced upon the House, by which it was sought to evade responsibility for a time, but which would end in bringing back a greatly increased responsibility upon the House. He believed that the course now proposed to be taken offered no certain settlement of the difficulty, and was utterly unworthy of the House of Commons.

Mr. E. Stanhope

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that the few observations which he would address to the House would be simply for the purpose of explaining the position of himself, and, he believed, of many other hon. Members. What was the position of the hon. Gentleman whose case they were considering? It was this, that he had outraged not only British sentiment, but Christian sentiment, and he was there in that Liberal House of Commons to express his humble opinion on the subject. On the other hand, the hon. Gentleman had written that letter to The Times, which had been alluded to, and which, no doubt, withdrew him from the favourable consideration of every hon. Gentleman in that House, and from that of every Christian. But there was something beyond. There was a question whether any particular constituency in this country had a right to send to that House any person, no matter how reprehensible he might be; and he believed many hon. Members entertained the same opinion as he did, that they ought to look beyond the letter which he had written to The Times to the much larger question whether a complete and thorough freedom of election ought to be enjoyed by the constituencies. He rose in that House to state that as regarded the action of the hon. Gentleman it had been one which he and a great many others could have no confidence in and no consideration for; but he entertained even more the opinion that the action of the constituency was of greater importance, and to the constituency he left the question whether the hon. Gentleman was a fit and proper person to take his seat in that House. Although he considered that Mr. Bradlaugh, by his letter to the public papers, had put himself in a position which entirely cut him off from sympathy, yet he was not prepared to encounter the much larger question whether an English constituency was not justified in sending to that House any Gentleman whom they pleased; and on this account he should decline, as he believed many others would, to vote on the present occasion.

MR. NEWDEGATE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Newdegate.)

O'DONNELL said, he should say a few words in support of motion for adjournment. At that hour, and after the observations had been made in that House by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), the members weighed upon them to grant the time for full consideration of attendant circumstances, so as to give full publicity. The debates of the day upon this question at that hour could not be fully published; and the members weighed upon them all in this great and painful question, and urged them by all means in their power to insist upon an adjournment. It might be said to the contrary, but he did not but think that the resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham was unusual where he instituted a contest between the Catholics and the Dissenters who had elected Mr. Bradburn to be their champion. Such a contest was in the highest degree offensive to the Catholic population. He ventured to say, in the first place, the Catholics were not relieved of disabilities of ages by a round-trip device like that which was now pressed upon the House. On the contrary, those disabilities were re-imposed after the subject had been fully discussed, and a Bill, brought in by the Government, had passed the Houses of the Realm. The whole proceedings in the matter confirmed him in the opinion that there should be the fullest discussion upon the question; and he thought the subject one which required to be considered fully and fairly. For his own part, he had not the slightest intention of urging the Government to evade its duty and proper responsibility.

TAFFORD NORTHCOTE hoped they might understand the Government assented to the motion of his hon. Friend for an adjournment. The question was one, not of great importance; and he was glad that there were a considerable number of Gentlemen who desired to come to the House upon the subject. He trusted that the Government would assent to that proposal.

GLADSTONE said that he had only waited until there was some motion that might be taken as evi-

a consolidation of several small ones and had been most carefully prepared. No changes whatever were contained in it.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that there were important clauses in the Bill and penalties up to £500 inflicted, where in England only 5s. was enforced. One of the clauses contained a penalty of £500 for destroying permits. He had an Amendment to reduce that penalty; and he, therefore, hoped they would proceed slowly with the Bill.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that Clauses 7 and 28 would, no doubt, be put separately.

MR. R. PAGET said, he thought it right to ask the Government if there was any new matter introduced into the Bill. He further remarked that it would be a serious thing to pass rapidly clause after clause containing such heavy penalties as £500. He thought the Committee would not be justified in going on with the Bill in that way.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could assure the hon. Member there was no new matter in the Bill.

MR. R. PAGET said, he should like to ask one question, which, no doubt, the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) would be able to answer, as he, in all probability, had looked at the Bill. It was—what was the alternative imprisonment in case of non-payment of the fine of £500?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could only say that the question of alternative imprisonment would be discussed as the clauses came on. Many of the clauses, no doubt, the Committee would be willing to accept on the high legal authority under the supervision of which the Bill had been drawn up.

MR. GORST said, he had understood the noble Lord to tell the Committee that there were no alterations in the Bill, but that it was simply one of consolidation. Subsequently, however, it had been stated that there were diminutions proposed in the case of some penalties. He thought that it was important to understand whether it was simply and solely a Consolidation Bill, or whether, as had been intimated, there were certain penalties in which a reduction was proposed. In the latter case the clauses of the Bill would require attention.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said there was only a slight alteration proposed in the case of a fine of £500 in Ireland.

MR. R. PAGET said, he should like to ask a further question. He wished to know whether the heavy penalties that were mentioned in the Bill were absolutely incapable of mitigation by the Court of Summary Jurisdiction before which the case was triable? He wished to have a distinct answer upon that point.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he had already stated that all that could be discussed when they came to the penalty clauses. Till then he should not be able to answer the question of the hon. Member.

MR. R. PAGET said, that the noble Lord talked of coming to the penalty clauses; but there were penalty clauses throughout the Bill. For instance, by Section 19 a distiller could be fined £500, and by Section 22, Sub-section 26, the same fine could be inflicted. He thought he was entitled to some information with regard to the mitigation of such penalties.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he had already informed the Committee that there was no alteration in the present state of the law.

MR. R. PAGET said, that under the Summary Jurisdiction Act there was a power of mitigation in certain cases.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said that the law would remain as before, and the power of mitigation would be the same.

MR. ONSLOW said, that on the second reading of the Bill the other night he had asked the noble Lord to postpone the Committee in order to allow time to look over the Bill. The noble Lord had then assured them that it was a Consolidation Bill that contained nothing new. He (Mr. Onslow) had looked over it, and quite agreed with the noble Lord that it was merely a Consolidation Bill; but, inasmuch as his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Paget) objected to some portions of it that were in fact not new, perhaps the noble Lord would consent to report Progress. So far as he himself was concerned, he saw no objection why the Bill should not pass through Committee; but still he thought that a little more time should be given, in order to give Members the opportunity of raising any question they thought proper.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the noble Lord

the Bill would not be interfered with by the Budget Resolutions of the hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There were some regulations laid down in the Bill for instance, Clause 23—in regard to distillers selling or removing spirits. He wished to know whether the Bill had been prepared from the Budget Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or whether it would not make considerable alterations necessary in the measure now before them?

FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would remind the noble Lord that he had just sat down that the Bill referred only to spirits.

MR. GORST said, the noble Lord (Frederick Cavendish) said the Bill referred only to spirits; but would it not also refer to malt? If it was the use of Clause 23? That would affect distillers were not to remove spirits from the malting premises certain persons employed in malting. That appeared to him clearly inconsistent with the Budget Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. NOLAN said, he had hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have allowed the Irish laws on the subject of malt to become the same as the English on the same subject. He did not see why Ireland should be treated differently in that matter. But the request that had been made had been refused by the Treasury. The refusal to amend the Malt Laws of the two countries was one of the reasons for which he had objected to the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. That subject had been treated in the same way by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. The laws on the subject, he thought, ought to be identical. He would like to have Clause 23 explained to the Committee. The Revenue received from those laws in Ireland amounted, he believed, to over £4,000,000, which went into the Exchequer and defrayed the whole cost of the Army and Education. He thought the subject was sufficiently important to be examined narrowly and knowing, as he did, how the House of Commons worked after half-past six o'clock, he thought it their duty that the Bill was properly passed.

LORD J. RUSSELL said, if the noble Lord wished for the Bill it would be the other way round, important or not, after being substantiated.

MR. GORST asked a question. The noble Lord answered. It would not affect that, but a sufficient answer with it.

LORD J. RUSSELL said, that the clauses relating to the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the Irish and he did not think it would be affected, however, it would be affected, of course the course the Government took was necessary; it stood, and it was desirable that the Government might take the course.

MAJOR RUSSELL said, the noble Lord would wish to know, but, for his part, he thought that the Bill should be assimilated to the English, which was the course which was being taken in the case of cattle. (Lord Russell said, that, in relation to malt.)

LORD J. RUSSELL said, he was not in favour of abolition, but he thought it would be better to affect the cattle; that was the course which was being taken.

MR. O'CONNOR said, several A. B. C. Bill was passed. He thought the reduction should be inflicted on the malt.

SIR HENRY CAMPBELL said, that the malt was much improved.

about that was because he imagined, if the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was passed, all restrictions with regard to malt would be taken off, and there would be absolute liberty to feed cattle and to use malt for any other purposes. The whole question seemed to him to come to this—whether any restrictions ought to be included in the Consolidation Bill, because, if they were so included, and the Bill were passed—and no one would admit more readily than he the necessity of passing such a Bill—immediately afterwards it would probably be found that these clauses that contained restrictions were unnecessary. Had it not been for those restrictions, the Consolidation Bill which was before the late Government, and which they were all anxious should pass, would some time since have become law.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped hon. Members would bear in mind one fact with reference to such Bills as the one under discussion, and that was that they were mainly for the convenience of persons out-of-doors. To the Revenue Department it mattered little whether there was a consolidation into one act or not, because, if not collected into one, they could easily discover when and how the separate Bills had been drawn up. The consolidation, of course, rendered reference less troublesome; but it mainly benefited the trade. With regard, then, to the principal question, that was, no doubt, the question of the malt. He hoped in the course of a few weeks to be able to state what exceptions there would be with reference to that tax. As a general rule, he believed the only exception would be where malt might be used among the materials that were higher taxed—articles such as spirit and raw material in certain cases. For that reason he hoped the clause would be allowed to be passed; and he thought that the Committee might be satisfied with the pledge given by his noble Friend (Lord Frederick Cavendish). In that case Members would not be put to the inconvenience of discussing the matter when the Speaker was in the Chair; but the Bill would be recommended with respect to those particular clauses. He thought the Bill was considered on the whole satisfactory; and, therefore, he trusted they might be allowed to proceed with it.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson

MR. R. PAGET said, he did not quite understand the course intended to be pursued by the Government, and he hoped that the noble Lord would move to report Progress. He desired to say this much, that he considered there was danger in their proceeding any further. He had ventured just before to ask the noble Lord a question whether the heavy penalties were subject to mitigation. He understood the noble Lord to say in reply that those penalties were not so subject; and he (Mr. Paget) was then under the impression that the noble Lord was wrong. Since putting the question, he had made inquiries of his hon. Friend near him, who had consulted the statute, and he now found that the Summary Jurisdiction Act did refer to that matter. Consequently the noble Lord did not appear to be well informed upon the subject; and he thought he had not that complete acquaintance with it that would justify him in asking the Committee to go on with the clauses of the Bill.

MR. GORST said, he really did not wish to cause any embarrassment to the Government; but the 23rd clause of this Bill could not possibly be required when the Budget propositions of the Prime Minister were carried out. By it a distiller was not to be allowed to sell any malt out of his malt-house, and if he did he was to be liable to a fine of £200. Surely it was not intended that a distiller, of all persons in the Kingdom, should be the only person not allowed to sell malt. What was the meaning of abolishing the Malt Tax if they were going to impose upon the distiller this peculiar disability. A clause like that had obviously been drawn by some person in ignorance of the intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Malt Tax; and now that those intentions were known, and it was understood by everybody that the Malt Tax would be repealed, it seemed to him it would obviously be better to postpone the further consideration of the 23rd clause until they had the propositions of the Budget Bill before them.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought the Committee would do well to accept the proposition of the noble Lord opposite. The only object of the Government, as he said, was to consider the convenience, and the wishes of hon. Members; and, for his part, he did not believe that hon. Members had the slightest idea of the magnitude of that Bill, or that it would come on at such an hour in the morning. The original proposition of the noble Lord, to which he did not understand the Prime Minister to have dissented, was to report Progress, when hon. Members not then present could see by the Papers that the discussion on the Bill had commenced, and those interested in it would be prepared on a future occasion to represent their views to the House and to the Government. Therefore, he hoped he should have the support of the noble Lord in moving to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

MR. BARING said, he had a few days ago proposed that the second reading should be adjourned, because hon. Members had not had time to make themselves acquainted with the Bill, and he was not quite sure that some alterations had not been introduced under the form of consolidation as had been occasionally done before. He was now perfectly satisfied that there was nothing of that sort in the Bill, except that in one or two cases there had been a mitigation of penalties; and, therefore, he was not at all prepared to accept the action of some hon. Members on his side of the House, because he thought they were confusing two very different things—namely, altering the law, and making it simpler. He, however, entirely agreed with the Prime Minister that it was very much for the interest of non-official and non-legal persons that the law should be as simple, practical, and clear as possible; and, so far as he could make out, this Bill was a good move in the direction of helping persons who were not official or legal persons to understand the law. If the propositions of the noble Lord opposite were carried, the law would not, as at present, be scattered through a great number of Acts; and while the result would be not to make the law at all more difficult, it would very beneficially affect its present state. He should prefer seeing the second reading of the Bill passed at once; and any alterations necessary, in consequence of the Budget Resolutions, could be made subsequently.

MR. O'SULLIVAN considered the restrictions on the keeping of malt by distillers quite unnecessary, as the Malt Tax was to be abolished; and, therefore, he would advise the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to adjourn the discussion on this proposal, in order that he might, in the meantime, consult the authorities.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that as it appeared to be desired by some hon. Members that more time should be given to consider the Bill, he would be quite ready to assent to the proposal; but, at the same time, he must remind the House that it was necessary for them to get on with their Business.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—[BILL 155.]

(Sir Thomas Chambers, Mr. Collins, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Alderman Cotton, Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Morley, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ONSLOW said, he rose to a point of Order. It was in the knowledge of all of them that in "another place" a Bill identical with the present one was now set down for discussion and stood for second reading on Friday. He wished to ask Mr. Speaker whether a Bill exactly similar to the present one could come on in "another place" at the same time?

MR. SPEAKER: Having no knowledge of the Bill in question I must defer answering the hon. Gentleman.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 211.]

(Mr. Dillwyn, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. James Howard.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. DILLWYN, in moving that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, said, he might observe that there were some Amendments proposed to be made in the Bill, and he had arranged with his hon.

Friends to report Progress directly the Chairman got into the Chair, in order to answer these Amendments, and then he hoped by Thursday they would be able to go on with the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MAJOR NOLAN observed that, if he read the Bill correctly, it proposed that all wild birds of whatever sort were to be preserved. He objected to that very much. He objected to magpies, hawks, and scorn-crows being preserved. He did not know of any other birds that he particularly objected to; but then he did not know much about them. He thought all birds which were considered to belong to the predacious classes ought not to be preserved. If these were omitted, he should be satisfied; but, otherwise he should be obliged to object to the Speaker leaving the Chair.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he thought his hon. Friends would be disposed to leave out the magpies; but he should like to say a word for hawks. They were a very interesting, and, in some cases, useful tribe of birds, and were being rapidly exterminated. Still, if it was wished to exclude them, their case might be considered in Committee. No doubt his hon. Friends would consent to do that. Therefore, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would allow them to get into Committee, as it was not proposed at present to go any further. The reason for protecting all wild birds was that it was found that when only certain classes were protected persons who destroyed them always pretended, when they were caught, that they were out for the purpose of destroying birds which were not protected by the Bill.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was exceedingly anxious that this Bill should be allowed to pass, because, at the present time, he did not think the House was aware of the extent to which the existing laws were set at naught, and the amount of cruelty that was perpetrated on many birds. He was quite sure his hon. and gallant Friend opposite would not wish to see many birds which he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) could name left unprotected as they were by the existing law. This Bill really would only enable the old law for the protection of birds to be enforced, and would give some guarantee, at any rate, against the cruelties undoubtedly perpetrated under the existing law.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY did not think the Bill would at all prevent cruelty from being committed, for this was the third Wild Birds' Protection Bill that he had known during the last half-dozen years, and the others were certainly inoperative. He objected to this Bill, because he thought it had the character of a Game Bill. ["Oh!"] Hon. Members might smile; but one effect of it would be to protect wood pigeons, which were a greater nuisance than all the game birds put together. It was required by the Bill that an occupier of land, to protect his crops by shooting birds, must either do it himself, or give a writing under his hand to somebody else. He thought that farmers and market gardeners, who principally kept wild birds, should have full liberty to kill them; whereas, if they had to give permission in writing to persons to do it, he thought they would be very much hampered. He was sorry to say that he felt he must oppose this Bill, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press them to go into Committee that night, but would give them some opportunity to discuss the whole measure at a time when the speeches of hon. Members could be reported. Many persons had sentimental feelings in regard to birds; but such people usually knew nothing of the depredations of which market gardeners and farmers and others complained. Those persons certainly should be heard in this matter, for in Scotland, at any rate, wood pigeons had become such a nuisance that subscriptions had been entered into amongst the farmers for having them shot down and their nests destroyed. Under the present Bill he doubted very much whether that could be done. He objected very much to proposals of this kind to keep large stocks of birds at the expense of farmers and market gardeners.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT understood that his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) did not propose to go further than merely getting the House into Committee; and, therefore, he did not see that anyone could object to that. There was a good deal to be said against some points in the Bill, for he was afraid, for instance, one clause in it would prevent the importation of ortolans, quails, and other foreign game birds, which, of course, was not desirable. Then, with regard to what his hon. Friend (Mr. Barclay) had said, he was not at all sure whether this would not be a very good substitute for a Game Bill, if, instead of protecting particular birds, the House laid down the principle that all birds might be killed by anybody who had the permission of the tenant; it would be a very good provision, but, of course, he did not propose to discuss that subject then. There was a good deal in the Bill that required criticism; but he was quite sure before Committee was actually reached his hon. Friend would be quite ready to discuss all these questions.

MR. ONSLOW remarked that this objection as to ortolans and quails had been already pointed out to him, and in consequence he had spoken to two very large game importers on the subject; and, from what he heard from them, he was quite sure that his hon. Friend would move to have them exempted. At the same time he did hope the Bill would be allowed to pass. With regard to hawks, he might remind the hon. Baronet that there was only one class which lived on game birds—namely, sparrow hawks, and that the kestrel did not. Therefore, the only necessity was for the exclusion of one particular kind of hawk.

MR. R. PAGET said, if the Home Secretary favoured the principle of the Bill, he hoped he was also in favour of Clause 4, which gave the legal owner of the land power to withdraw any authority to kill or destroy any wild bird, so that the principle would be established that the owner had absolute power to withdraw any authority to kill or destroy any wild birds, and had power to deal as he pleased, and reserve the right of killing and taking those birds, which were the subject of the Bill.

MR. T. T. PAGET hoped the House would go at once into Committee; for he believed that wholesale destruction of wild birds was at present going on. In the particular part of the country from which he came he knew that insects had very largely increased in consequence of the small birds having been killed; and, therefore, he hoped that the House would do its best to secure some protection for the small birds.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN thought the Bill ought to be sent to the Select Committee; for it could not be fairly discussed in that way. They had had Select Committees on this subject already, and the result was not eminently satisfactory; but the results would be still less so if the House were to discuss this Bill in Committee at such an hour of the night as that. If the House allowed the Speaker to leave the Chair, they would not be able to amend the Bill afterwards as it should be amended; and he, for one, though very unwilling to oppose the Bill, would therefore say "No" to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble.

MAJOR NOLAN said, no doubt this was a very good Bill; but he should like to have the views of some people upon it before it passed into law. Certainly the predacious class of birds ought to be removed from it altogether. ["Progress!"] Hon. Gentlemen might say "Progress." [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: But Progress will be moved immediately.] He (Major Nolan) knew it would; but he wanted to talk about the Bill to show how it might be improved. Wood pigeons, for instance, had been mentioned; and there were many other birds which were very injurious. For instance, a man who shot rooks would be liable to all these penalties, unless he got a permission in writing. This was a very good Bill in its way, and he had no objection to it generally; but he ought to know whether his particular views would be met or not, as, if not, it would be tolerably easy to stop it at the present stage; while if it were allowed now to go on without any declaration on the part of the Members who had it in charge that they were ready to agree to his proposals, that subsequently would be very difficult. He should certainly oppose the Bill as much as he could unless he got an assurance to that effect.

MR. DILLWYN replied, that he was not only willing, but anxious, to meet the wishes of the hon. and gallant Gen-

cure a Return of the number of evictions in Ireland for non-payment of rent during the years 1878 and 1879 in each Poor Law Union scheduled under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act? The noble Earl said, he wished to explain the reasons which had induced him to put this Question to Her Majesty's Government. A large number of evictions were said to have taken place in Ireland of late; and in consequence of that statement he thought the Government, especially as legislation was to be proposed on a principle never before heard of in any civilized country, were bound to allow the persons who had committed these evictions to be known to the public, if there were any such persons. He himself did not believe that there had been in Ireland during the last few years a great number of evictions. On his own estate in the county of Down, on which there were more than 1,700 tenants, within the last 10 years there had not been a single eviction except at the instance of the tenants themselves. He was not stating this in order to take any credit for it to himself or any of his predecessors, because he believed the the same state of things was the case upon a very large majority of the estates in Ireland. If the Government would consent to give the information which he asked for to the country, he was quite prepared to alter the Return in any way his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council desired, so long as the main facts were disclosed. He also wished to call the attention of his noble Friend to the wording of his Question. He wished to ascertain the number of ejectments that had been carried out, but did not want to know how many had been served, because many tenants had to have ejectments served upon them in order to induce them to pay their rent.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM wished to corroborate the statement which had been made by the noble Earl, and also to mention a few facts to the House. Speaking from his own personal experience, and following the steps of the noble Earl, he could say that last year in Donegal, when he went to that part of the country, the tenants absolutely refused to make any payment of rent, although they were at the time two years in arrears. In consequence, he had been obliged to send out notices—upon which there were no costs—but not a single tenant would respond. What was the result? Of course he had to proceed to the last extremity, and served, accordingly, notices upon every townland on the estate. He believed he served as many as 260 ejectments; and when the tenants found he was not to be trifled with, they at once came in and paid what they could, the result being that he received between £8,000 and £10,000 without any really severe pressure upon the tenantry. But how many of these ejectments had been executed? Why, he did not think three tenants had been evicted, and still nearly every tenant owed him more than one year's rent; some of the tenants owed him three or four years' rent. He had not taken advantage of that; but, as a Bill to punish the Irish landlords was going to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government in "another place," he thought it desirable that the information now asked for should be furnished to Parliament.

EARL SPENCER: I have no objection to accede to the request of the noble Earl who put the Question. With regard to what he has stated as to the evictions, as far as I understand the Return that will be made, it will refer to the actual evictions made, and not the mere notices of evictions. In addition to the Return asked for, I would suggest that the Return should be extended so as to include the early months of this year. I think that is an important addition to the Return asked for by my noble Friend. As he does not move actually for the Return, I may say that I am prepared to grant the Return on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and I will confer with the noble Earl, if he will allow me, as to the actual form in which I shall present the Return. It will be necessary for me to consult with the Chief Secretary in the matter; but after doing so I will consult the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that one of the special charges made against the Irish landlords was that the existing distress had been used by some landlords to enforce evictions; and it was a question whether it might not be well to see the proportion which those evictions in the distressed districts bore to the evictions to the country generally.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY said, he agreed to the alterations proposed by the Lord President of the Council; but

EARLDOM OF MAR.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: I beg to give Notice to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that on Thursday, July 1st, I shall move—

That in accordance with the Resolution agreed to by this House on the 14th June, "That it is incumbent upon this House to rescind their Order of 26th February 1875, which ran as follows, viz.: 'That at the future meetings of the Peers of Scotland assembled under any Royal Proclamation for the election of a Peer or Peers to represent the Peerage of Scotland in Parliament, the Lord Clerk Register, or the Clerks of Session officiating thereat in his name, do call the title of Earl of Mar according to its place on the Roll of Peers of Scotland called at such election, and do receive and count the vote of the Earl of Mar claiming to vote in right of the said earldom, and do permit him to take part in the proceedings of such election;'" to resolve that the said Order be rescinded, and that intimation to that effect be made to the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland.

OUTRAGES (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK moved for a Return of all robberies and attempted robberies of arms which have been reported by the Royal Irish Constabulary between the 1st of January 1878 and the 31st of March 1880, giving particulars of crime, arrests, and results of proceedings in the following form:—Number, date, and name of persons whose arms were taken or attempted to be taken; offence, giving description and short details of persons made amenable and the result of the proceedings. The noble Earl said, he moved for this Return, which was supplemental to the Return which the Lord President of the Council moved for a short time ago with regard to agrarian crime.

EARL SPENCER said, he did not move for the Return referred to.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK begged pardon for the mistake he had made. He referred to the Return which the late Lord President of the Council laid upon the Table. That Return contained the number of agrarian crimes in Ireland committed during the course of 1879 and the first month of the present year, and many of their Lordships considered that that Return showed a state of things in Ireland which was by no means satisfactory. The number of offences contained in that Return was no less than 979; but from the nature of the Return it was impossible to include in it a number of very grave offences, which also, he thought, showed a very unsatisfactory state of things in Ireland—namely, robberies, and attempted robberies of arms. He believed offences of this character had prevailed to a great extent throughout Ireland during the last year; and he knew, from his own personal experience, that in a very small district indeed no less than six outrages had been committed within the space of a very few miles in a very short space of time by armed bands varying in number from two to ten, with different degrees of violence. From his own experience, he feared that the number of these offences committed throughout Ireland in the course of the year must have been very considerable. It could scarcely be supposed that the object of the persons engaged in those outrages was mere robbery, or that their intention was to use the arms only in shooting hares and rabbits. It was to be feared that they desired possession of arms for a purpose much more serious. The form in which he moved for the Return was identical with that adopted in the Return relating to agrarian outrages to which he had referred. He trusted it would be found that he was wrong in assuming that this particular class of crime had been numerous; but he thought, in any case, it would be desirable to have information on the subject.

EARL SPENCER: Her Majesty's Government have no objection to grant the Return for which my noble Friend has moved.

Motion agreed to.

Return of all robberies and attempted robberies of arms which have been reported by the Royal Irish Constabulary between the 1st of January 1879 and the 31st of March 1880, giving particulars of crime, arrests, and results of proceedings in the following form:—Number: Date of Offence: Names of Persons whose Arms were taken or attempted to be taken: Offence:—Description; Short Details; Names of Persons made amenable: Result of Proceedings.—(The Earl of Limerick.)

Ordered to be laid before the House.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—EVICTIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY asked the Lord President of the Council, Whether Her Majesty's Government would pro-

cure a Return of the number of evictions in Ireland for non-payment of rent during the years 1878 and 1879 in each Poor Law Union scheduled under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act? The noble Earl said, he wished to explain the reasons which had induced him to put this Question to Her Majesty's Government. A large number of evictions were said to have taken place in Ireland of late; and in consequence of that statement he thought the Government, especially as legislation was to be proposed on a principle never before heard of in any civilized country, were bound to allow the persons who had committed these evictions to be known to the public, if there were any such persons. He himself did not believe that there had been in Ireland during the last few years a great number of evictions. On his own estate in the county of Down, on which there were more than 1,700 tenants, within the last 10 years there had not been a single eviction except at the instance of the tenants themselves. He was not stating this in order to take any credit for it to himself or any of his predecessors, because he believed the the same state of things was the case upon a very large majority of the estates in Ireland. If the Government would consent to give the information which he asked for to the country, he was quite prepared to alter the Return in any way his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council desired, so long as the main facts were disclosed. He also wished to call the attention of his noble Friend to the wording of his Question. He wished to ascertain the number of ejectments that had been carried out, but did not want to know how many had been served, because many tenants had to have ejectments served upon them in order to induce them to pay their rent.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM wished to corroborate the statement which had been made by the noble Earl, and also to mention a few facts to the House. Speaking from his own personal experience, and following the steps of the noble Earl, he could say that last year in Donegal, when he went to that part of the country, the tenants absolutely refused to make any payment of rent, although they were at the time two years in arrears. In consequence, he had been obliged to send out notices—upon which there were no costs—but not a single tenant would respond. What was the result? Of course he had to proceed to the last extremity, and served, accordingly, notices upon every townland on the estate. He believed he served as many as 260 ejectments; and when the tenants found he was not to be trifled with, they at once came in and paid what they could, the result being that he received between £8,000 and £10,000 without any really severe pressure upon the tenantry. But how many of these ejectments had been executed? Why, he did not think three tenants had been evicted, and still nearly every tenant owed him more than one year's rent; some of the tenants owed him three or four years' rent. He had not taken advantage of that; but, as a Bill to punish the Irish landlords was going to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government in "another place," he thought it desirable that the information now asked for should be furnished to Parliament.

EARL SPENCER: I have no objection to accede to the request of the noble Earl who put the Question. With regard to what he has stated as to the evictions, as far as I understand the Return that will be made, it will refer to the actual evictions made, and not the mere notices of evictions. In addition to the Return asked for, I would suggest that the Return should be extended so as to include the early months of this year. I think that is an important addition to the Return asked for by my noble Friend. As he does not move actually for the Return, I may say that I am prepared to grant the Return on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and I will confer with the noble Earl, if he will allow me, as to the actual form in which I shall present the Return. It will be necessary for me to consult with the Chief Secretary in the matter; but after doing so I will consult the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that one of the special charges made against the Irish landlords was that the existing distress had been used by some landlords to enforce evictions; and it was a question whether it might not be well to see the proportion which those evictions in the distressed districts bore to the evictions to the country generally.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY said, he agreed to the alterations proposed by the Lord President of the Council; but he should like to ask whether Her Majesty's Government would give a Return of all the landlords in Ireland? He should very much like to know how many evictions had taken place throughout the whole of Ireland.

EARL SPENCER thought the best course would be for him to confer with the noble Earl below the Gangway (the Earl of Limerick) and the noble Earl who had asked the Question; but he must point out that it would be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to grant what the noble Earl wished—namely, to give the names of all the landlords who had evicted tenants. He thought it would not be possible for the Government to grant that, although they would extend the Return to the whole of Ireland.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY said, he merely said that he himself should have liked to know how many evictions had taken place in Ireland; but he thought that Her Majesty's Government could hardly take the responsibility of refusing the country the Return he asked for, considering the extraordinary nature of the legislation that was about to be proposed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY pointed out that the Lord President of the Council had not refused to grant the Return, but only said that he could not grant the names of the landlords who had evicted tenants.

House adjourned at a half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, Certificates and Reports

For the Borough of Wallingford; and For the Borough of Westbury.

And the same were severally read, as follows:—

WALLINGFORD ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To the Rt. Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, knt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify that upon the 18th day of June 1880, and the following day, we held a Court at Wallingford for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Wallingford between Edward Wells, Petitioner; and Walter Wren, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, We certify that we determined that the said Respondent was not duly elected and returned, and that the said Election is void. And we hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we further, in pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices, that is to say, of bribery at the said Election:—Harry Hedges, Thomas Hedges, James Rusher, John Rusher, Charles Harris, Joseph Lamb, Edwin Butcher, Isaac Wilkins, George Sanders, James Pratt, James Taplin, and John Green.

3. That we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which this Petition relates.

Wallingford,
19th June 1880.

HENRY C. LOPES.

WESTBURY ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880.

To the Right Honourable

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th days of June 1880, We duly held a Court at the Town Hall in the Borough of Westbury, in the County of Wilts, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Abraham Laverton, Petitioner; and Charles Nicholas Paul Phipps, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify and report that, at the conclusion of the said trial, we determined that the said Charles Nicholas Paul Phipps, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, was duly Elected and Returned, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, Report as follows:—

(a.) That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such Election;

(b.) We further Report that the following persons have been proved, at the trial, to have been guilty of the corrupt practice of bribery:—

George Cornish, of Lower Road, Westbury, farmer,

William Cornish, senior, of Westbury;

(c.) That there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Westbury, to which the said Petition relates.

Dated this 18th day of June 1880.

ROBT. LUSH.

HENRY MANISTY.

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

THE ARMY CIRCULARS—APPENDIX TO CLAUSE 154—ADVERTISEMENTS.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that the "Newcastle Guardian," the "Birmingham Morning News," the "North Briton," and other journals printed in the list of newspapers in which Army advertisements may appear in the Appendix to Clause 154 of the Army Circulars, 1st June 1880, are no longer in existence; and, if so, whether he will direct a revision of the list?

MR. CHILDERS: I have to thank the noble Lord for calling my attention to the somewhat obsolete character of the newspaper list in the Appendix to Clause 154 of the Army Circulars. It is a matter with which the War Office has nothing to do, but I have communicated with the Treasury on the subject; and an amended, and, I hope, more accurate list of newspapers in which Army advertisements may appear has been received to-day.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — POSTAL COMMUNICATION IN LEITRIM.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Postmaster General, What reply has been given by the Post Office authorities to an application from the residents of Glenade, co. Leitrim, to have daily Postal communication between that village and Manor Hamilton, co. Leitrim; and, if there is any prospect of such Postal communication being soon established in that locality?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, there was already postal communication between Glenade and Kinlough four days a-week, and it had not been found to pay the expenses, so that he could not offer any hopes of a daily service.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS DISTRICT OF DROMORE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If it be true that, about a year ago, the Magistrates of Tyrone, assembled at the Omagh Quarter Sessions, resolved to form a new petty sessions district, comprising a number of townlands in the county of Tyrone, and a few in the county of Fermanagh, and having its court in the village of Dromore; that a court-house was accordingly erected at Dromore, and several petty sessions held there, but that the Court of Queen's Bench being appealed to on the subject, delivered a judgment quashing the whole proceedings, and declaring the establishment of the new petty sessions district void; if, since the intervention of the Queen's Bench Court, the Magistrates of Tyrone have refused to take back the village of Dromore, and the townlands assigned to the Dromore district, into the petty sessions district to which they formerly belonged, with the result that the inhabitants of that village and those townlands have been left since the 3rd of April last without the ordinary service of the law; and, if he can assure the House that the Government will take steps to make amends to the district isolated by this conduct of the magistrates?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Sir, in answer to the first part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, it is a fact that the Chairman and Justices of the county Tyrone, assembled in Quarter Sessions, did form a new Petty Sessions district having its court-house in the village of Dromore, as stated. To form this district, they took a number of townlands from certain adjoining Petty Sessions districts of the county Tyrone and a few from the Petty Sessions district of Lack, in the county Fermanagh, declaring that all should together constitute the new Petty Sessions district of Dromore. The Court of Queen's Bench being appealed to by the Petty Sessions Clerk of Lack, has quashed not the whole proceedings, but, as I am informed, only so much of the Quarter Sessions order as purported to transfer the townlands belonging to the Lack district, in the county Fermanagh, leaving the order and constitution of the new district unaffected as to the rest. With regard to the second part of the Question, I am not aware of any application having been made to the Tyrone Justices to take back the village of Dromore and other townlands which still form parts of the Dromore district. They, as I understand, now constitute the Petty Sessions district of Dromore; and the Petty Sessions there held will, we hope, be found a convenience to the inhabitants. While the legal constitution of the district, as including the Lack townlands, was being litigated, it was thought prudent to suspend the holding of any Petty Sessions at Dromore; but now that the controversy has been decided and the true area of jurisdiction ascertained, the holding of Sessions will, I presume, be at once resumed.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—APPORTIONMENT OF EXPENSES.

MR. J. K. CROSS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is yet able to state the intentions of Her Majesty's Government respecting the apportionment of the charges for the cost of the Afghan War; and, whether he can state the amount, if any, which will be charged upon the Home Treasury during the current year?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry that I must still make the same reply which I gave to a similar Question a short time ago, and state that our information does not enable us to give any clear account at the present moment of the charges of the Afghan War, and, therefore, does not suffice to raise any question that might be supposed to lie between the Indian and the Home Government. It would be inconvenient to the House that we should produce to the House an authenticated statement liable to be overturned or materially changed by subsequent and more detailed information.

THE TREATY OF BERLIN—EXECUTION OF THE ARTICLES.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government are taking any and, if so, what steps to procure the prompt execution of the unfulfilled provisions of the Treaty of Berlin which do not depend upon the action of Turkey?

MR. GLADSTONE: There are a very large number of unfulfilled provisions in the Treaty of Berlin—that is to say, of provisions which are partially fulfilled, as well as of some that are wholly unfulfilled. Out of the 60 odd Articles of the Treaty there are about 24 in regard to which the provisions are yet in one of those two categories. We should desire to see all the obligatory provisions fulfilled—I do not say those that are optional. At the same time, we think a distinction may be made between those that are important and those that are less important. For example, there is the question of the Frontier between Roumelia and Bulgaria, which is a matter not finally settled, but which advances towards settlement; but we cannot think that questions of that kind, nor even the much more important one of razing the fortresses, is to be compared in importance with those provisions in which the action of Turkey is principally concerned, because those are provisions which bear directly upon the peace and security of the districts concerned, upon the possession of guarantees for life, property, and honour. Undoubtedly we shall take all steps, as opportunity may offer, for the fulfilment of the provisions of the whole Treaty.

INLAND REVENUE—NON-INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

BARON DE FERRIERES asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is true that the Inland Revenue authorities have given instructions to prosecute the manufacturers for sale of non-intoxicating beverages in whose production balm is used, but which contain no appreciable quantity of alcohol; and, if no such instructions have been given, is there any intention of doing so?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, this was a matter which was in progress at the time he took Office. The Board of Inland Revenue, as a matter of administration, found themselves in a difficulty with respect to the increasing sale of non-intoxicating beverages in which alcohol was generated in the process of manufacture just as in the case of intoxicating beverages. The Board of Inland Revenue laid down the rule that they would not prosecute in those cases where the crude alcohol was less than 3 per cent, which ought to be tolerably safe as regarded its non-intoxicating quality. In the existing state of legislation with regard to Beer and Malt Duties, there had been an entire suspension of the proceedings against the brewers of such articles, and the subject would remain for consideration until a future day.

MERCANTILE MARINE—FRENCH BOUNTY ON SHIPPING.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the French Government have introduced, or intend to introduce, a measure providing for the payment of a bounty of one and a half francs per ton on every ton of new shipping built in France for each thousand miles traversed in voyages to and from France; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will exert their influence with the Government of France to prevent the enactment of a measure so re-actionary and so prejudicial to the interests of the British carrying and shipbuilding trades?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: A Bill to this effect has been before the French Chamber of Deputies for some months; but it has not yet become law. Her Majesty's Government will not fail to call attention to the subject in the course of any negotiations which may take place between the two Governments.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—THE SCHEDULE.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Schedule to the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill is to be considered as final, or whether he will be prepared in Committee to add to that Schedule, should he be convinced from the arguments which he may hear, that further districts require to be added?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member asks me rather a curious Question. He asks me if I will commence by making an alteration in this Bill before it is read a second time. I hope that this Bill, and any Bill that a Minister has charge of, will not be altered under such circumstances. I must say, however, that he advanced a very strong argument; but I think I can show, when I bring in the measure, why its operation should be confined to the scheduled district where there is exceptional distress.

NAVY—SCHOOL OF ENGINEERS AT KEYHAM.

MR. MAOLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the new school for engineers about to be opened at Keyham Yard, Devonport, had been placed under a new commander, instead of following the example so successfully pursued on board H.M.S. "Marlborough" at Portsmouth, where the discipline and internal arrangements are left entirely in the hands of the chief engineer; and, whether this appointment is not in direct contravention of Sir A. Cooper Key's Report?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is quite true, Sir, that in pursuance of a decision of the late Board of Admiralty, a commander has been put at the head of the new school for Engineers at Keyham. Admiral Sir A. Cooper Key informs me that this arrangement is not only not in contravention of the Report of the Committee of which he was Chairman, but was made upon his special recommendation; for although the arrangement in the Marlborough has worked well, he considered it very desirable to connect the Executive and Engineer branches of the Service by placing the school at Keyham under a judicious and carefully-selected commander.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE EASTERN ROUMELIAN COMMISSION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (for Mr. H. SAMUELSON) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress is being made with the business of the Eastern Roumelian Commission now assembled at Constantinople?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Commissioner arrived in Constantinople on the 22nd ultimo, but his Turkish Colleagues had not then been appointed, and no steps appear to have been taken to bring the Commission together until the 30th, when the names of the Turkish Commissioners were first announced. Said Pasha promised at the same time that translations of the proposed new Vilayet Law should be distributed immediately; but, notwithstanding repeated assurances to this effect, they are still withheld, and the Commission is consequently unable to proceed to business. The first formal meeting was held on the 17th instant, and a second meeting was to have taken place yesterday; but, according to the latest information received by Her Majesty's Government, it was adjourned by the Turkish Commissioner sine die. The other members of the Commission have expressed very strongly their dissatisfaction at these continued delays, and have insisted on an early meeting and a distribution of the official translation of the law.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL—CLAUSE 33—THE BEER DUTY.

MR. BIDDELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, under the thirty-third Clause of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, a small farmer living in a house of £8 or £10 annual value, and farming thirty or forty acres of land which, with his house, is of more than £20 annual value, will be allowed to brew without any Duty being charged on his malt beer?

MR. GLADSTONE: The 32nd clause of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was meant to imply—and undoubtedly does imply—that in the case of persons to be exempted the value of the land should be taken, together with that of the house itself. I confess I am very doubtful as to whether it would be possible to give any other form to the enactment without introducing a very great inequality into the law.

MR. BIDDELL wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was to be understood as saying that a small farmer would be liable to the duty?

MR. GLADSTONE: A farmer whose house and land together are valued at above £20 would be liable to make returns of the materials used by him in order not to be inspected in his process, but to be charged beer duty upon those materials.

MR. BIDDELL: And to pay it.

HALL MARKING (GOLD AND SILVER)— FORGED HALL MARKS.

MR. M. GUEST asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph which has lately appeared in several of the Daily Newspapers, stating that 647 pieces of antique plate, with forged Hall Marks, had been found in the possession of a collector who had purchased them at an enormous price, as genuine; whether steps will be taken, in pursuance of the Act 7 and 8 Vic. c. 22, s. 3, to enforce the penalties with regard to the seller of such plate; and, further, having regard to the enormous increase in the numbers of such frauds, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend the adoption of some more efficient means for putting a stop to such illegal practices, with a view to protecting the Revenue and the public at large?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The attention of the Board of Inland Revenue was drawn some time ago to paragraphs which appeared in the daily newspapers relative to the discovery that a number of pieces of plate had been sold bearing forged hall marks, and it was found on inquiry at Goldsmiths' Hall that action was being taken in the matter. A statement has been prepared to-day, in consequence of the Question of my hon. Friend, by Mr. Prideaux, the clerk of the Goldsmiths' Company, showing the nature of the case and the present state of the proceedings. In the present instance the marks purport to be of the reign of Queen Anne, which is prior to the date of the first imposition of the plate duty, and there are, consequently, no duty marks thereon. The Board of Inland Revenue would certainly deem it incumbent on them to take proceedings for the forgery of duty marks when such could be proved.

MR. M. GUEST asked, Whether the noble Lord would kindly put the Paper on the Table of the House?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I scarcely think it is of sufficient importance; but if the hon. Member moves for it I shall have no objection to place it on the Table.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Schedule to the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill does not comprise all those districts where the anti-rent agitation has been most vigorous, where outrages against life and property have been most frequent, and where the conviction of the perpetrators of outrages has been found quite unattainable?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Might I also ask, Whether the districts referred to in the Question are not those in which the distress is reported to be most keen and severe?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not aware, Sir, of any districts where the conviction of the perpetrators of outrages has been found quite unattainable. I find that at the last Assizes, both in Mayo and Galway, several convictions for attacks on process servers—I suppose those are the outrages to which the hon. Gentleman alludes—were obtained. It is quite true that the scheduled districts, in which there is exceptional distress, are also the districts in which there have been the most agrarian outrages. I am not sure whether they are the districts in which outrages against life and property are more frequent than those of any other kind; but I have little doubt it is so. I believe they are the districts in which the anti-rent agitation has been the most prevalent.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—ATTENDANCE OF TEACHERS IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a Resolution passed by the Clergy of Letterkenny, County Donegal, diocese of Raphoe, and published in the "Freeman's Journal" of June 18th, to the effect that—

"The average attendance required by the Commissioners of National Education by a late rule of theirs for the employment of assistants, workmistresses' and monitors in the national schools is excessive and injurious to education, and that the Irish Members be asked to urge upon the Government the necessity of returning to the late scale;"

and, whether the Government propose to take any steps in the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member asks me whether the Government propose to take steps in a matter which has been brought under notice by a Resolution passed within a day or two, and he gave Notice of it only yesterday, at least I only find it on the Paper to-day. I think he will see that no Government willing to give proper information on an administrative measure could answer such a Question so soon. I will cause inquiries to be made, and will see what reply the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland will have to make.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA."

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he is in a position to communicate any information as to the probability of the raft reported to have been seen by the barque "Scotia Queen," on the 22nd April, being connected with H.M.S. "Atalanta"?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Admiralty received a few days ago fuller information, through the commanding officer of the Castro, at Shields, from the master of the Scotia Queen as to the raft which it was supposed might have been connected with the Atalanta.

"The raft," it is reported, "was seen on the 22nd of April about 150 miles to E.S.E. of Bermuda. As near as it could be noticed it was made of square pitch pine logs, two tiers high floating very deep. There were no rope fastenings, and it was supposed to be bolted. About 400 yards from it two bodies were seen, apparently with white jumpers on, and the master is of opinion they were men-of-war's men."

Considering that the interval of 83 days elapsed between the Atalanta leaving Bermuda and this raft being sighted so near the Island, and that the raft was constructed of materials which could not have been on board the Atalanta, the Admiralty is of opinion it is impossible it could have been connected with that vessel.

IRISH LAND ACT, 1870.

LORD ELCHO asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will give to the House the names of the Special Commissioners who are to be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Irish Land Act, 1870, and lay upon the Table the instructions under which they are to act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, so far as I have been able to observe, it is not usual to lay on the Table of the House the instructions to a Royal Commission nor the names. It has been already stated that before the Commission will be appointed—before they begin their labours—we shall be glad to enable the House fully to understand what is the nature of the inquiry; and with regard to the names, as soon as we have fixed on them we will state them orally in the House.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE —THE SUGAR BOUNTIES.

MR. J. STEWART asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the negotiations which were now going on for the renewal of the Commercial Treaty with France, the Government will keep before them the question of Bounties granted on Refined Sugar exported from France, with a view to their termination?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: When the negotiations for a new Commercial Treaty with France are set on foot the Sugar Question will be included in the subjects for discussion between the two Governments.

IRISH CHURCH ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL—THE MINOR INCUMBENTS.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a deputation on behalf of the Minor Incumbents and Curates of the Irish Church having waited upon him on Wednesday last, in support of "The Irish Church Act (1869) Amendment Bill," he will state to the House the course which the Government are prepared to take with respect to that measure?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is able to bring his Bill to the second reading, the Government, I need not say, will pay all attention to the arguments in favour of the individuals on whose behalf he moves. With regard, however, to the course which the Government, as at present advised, will adopt, I must say that we are not able to accept the Bill. I am very sorry for the individual suffering of several of the gentlemen referred to—namely, those who were minor incumbents at the time of the passing of the Act. That Act, in the opinion of the Parliament of the day, and of the present Government, provided compensation in all cases in which it was due. The gentlemen in question ask to be compensated for the loss of their hope, or expectation, or chances of promotion; and, notwithstanding individual suffering, the Government cannot assent to the principle on which their claims are based. Their case was brought before both Houses of Parliament at the time of the passing of the Act and was carefully considered. Now that six years have elapsed since the question was mooted, it is clear that the late Government could not have dealt with the matter, or else, no doubt, they would have done so.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Prime Minister, What would be the Business of the House on Thursday and Friday, and when the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill would be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that on Thursday it was proposed to take the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, the Savings Banks Bill, the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages, &c.) Bill, and the Post Office Money Orders Bill. The Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill would be put down for Friday.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the great importance of having the facts connected with the cruel oppression of the Mahomedans of the Balkan Peninsula fully elicited by a public discussion in this House, the right hon. Gentleman would be so good as to give him facilities for bringing forward his Motion, which regarded the life and security of thousands of suffering human beings?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have no facilities for bringing forward our own Business. I am afraid, therefore, I cannot possibly undertake to give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity of raising his question by setting aside Government Business. We have taken measures for bringing the whole of the facts before us; and when we are in possession of them we shall not hesitate to do our duty in regard to them, or to make known to the House what has taken place.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the right hon. Gentleman state what measures have been taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: As I stated on a previous occasion, means of inquiry have been instituted which are likely to lead to thorough and full information.

MERCANTILE MARINE — FRENCH BOUNTY ON SHIPPING.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he was aware that the French Government was about to pass a law providing for the payment of a bounty on every ton of new shipping built in France? He had received a telegram from Glasgow that he proposed to read to the House—

"We have advice from our French correspondent that the French Government are this week to pass a law providing for payment of a bounty of 1*½* f. per ton on every ton of new ships built in France for each thousand miles traversed in voyages to and from France. This is equivalent to a bounty of about £2,000 per voyage on the class of steamers we employ between France and South America, or equal to 10 per cent per annum on the steamer's value. This will practically drive British shipping out of French carrying trade. We understand some of the large French Shipping Companies have arranged to double their fleet the moment this becomes law."

He wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman could confirm the intelligence contained in that telegram?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not know that I can add anything to the statement I have already made. We have information confirming the intelligence of the hon. Member that the Bill in question is at present before the French Chamber of Deputies. The telegram is identical in its wording to a despatch addressed to several Members of the House and also to the Prime Minister. The telegram says that the French Government is this week to pass a law, &c. That, of course, is a matter for the French Parliament, and I believe that this Bill has been for several months before the Chamber of Deputies; but I cannot inform the hon. Member whether it is likely to become law within the course of the week. However, the matter is one that has been receiving the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and our views will be brought to the knowledge of the French Government during our negotiations.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—FOURTH EAST YORK ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. C. WILSON asked the Secretary of State for War, When the inquiry into the conduct of certain of the officers of the 4th East York Artillery Volunteers would be opened; and whether its scope could be so extended as to include the causes, political or otherwise, that led to the resignation of the officers and men?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, he must distinctly refuse to go into any such matter until the question of grave insubordination committed on Wednesday last was properly inquired into. The inquiry would, he believed, be held at Hull on Friday.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to section 5 of "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879" (42 and 43 Vic. c. 49), enacted in place of "The Small Penalties Act, 1865" (28 and 29 Vic. c. 127), and the doubt which is entertained about its construction, viz., whether the maximum imprisonment in each case should be governed by the amount of the penalty which the justices have inflicted, or by the amount of the penalty and the costs combined; and, whether he can help the justices of the peace with authoritative advice so as to secure correct and uniform practice under the section in question?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the section of the Act in question provided that the maximum amount of imprisonment under the Act should be governed by the amount of the pecuniary penalty that might be inflicted in addition to, and not in exclusion of, costs.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—POOR LAW UNIONS (IRELAND).

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I beg to give Notice that on Thursday I shall ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland—as he seems now more inclined to answer Questions than he was yesterday—Whether any of the Poor Law Unions set forth in the Schedule of the new Irish Land Bill were not scheduled as distressed Unions by the Local Government Board prior to the 29th of February last; and, if so, whether he will name them, and state whether they are simply scheduled now for the purpose of preventing ejection for the non-payment of rent?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I can answer that Question at once. No Union has been scheduled for any such purpose.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Might I ask whether any of the Unions scheduled were not scheduled by the Local Government Board before the 29th of February?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I thought it advisable to answer at once the first portion of the Question, because there was in it an inference—[“No, no!”]—yes, a most decisive inference—that the Government, not having told the House until quite lately of their introducing a Bill, had been preparing for that Bill. Perhaps the noble Lord will take my word for it that we did not think it necessary to prepare the Bill by scheduling Unions for that purpose. If the Government had done so it would have been a most unfair act, and I think it desirable to remove that unfair inference at once. I cannot, at this moment, say when the different Unions were scheduled. If the noble Lord thinks it worth while to repeat the Question on another day, I will endeavour to answer it; but I trust he will abstain from making inferences of this decided character.

PRIVILEGE.

MR. BRADLAUGH.—RESOLUTION.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st June],

“That Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for the Borough of Northampton, be admitted to make an Affirmation or Declaration, instead of the Oath required by Law.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “having regard to the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72,”—(Sir Hardinge Giffard,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that from almost everyone with whom he was brought into contact—whether a Liberal or a Conservative by political opinion—he had heard the observation—“What a muddle the House of Commons has got into in this matter of Mr. Bradlaugh!” The same feeling had found expression in the Public Press. An article in The Times of that day had expressed it very fully; and he would ask the House to consider for a few moments how it had got into that which he must call a disgraceful muddle. It was disgraceful, because the subject involved was really a very grave one; and he must say that he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House and Her Majesty's Government were principally accountable for the difficulty in which the House was placed. When Mr. Bradlaugh appeared at the Table of the House he claimed to affirm instead of taking the Parliamentary Oath. Not contented with the precedents into which inquiries had formerly been instituted—as in the case of Mr. Archdale, as in the case of Mr. Pease, as in the case of

Baron Rothschild, and in the case of Mr. Alderman Salomons, who had felt difficulties as to taking the Oaths—Her Majesty's Government moved the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire whether Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm instead of taking the Oath of Allegiance, with this unprecedented addition to its power—that it should not only examine and report precedents and any points of law that might bear on the case, but that it should express its opinion thereon to the House. That Committee inquired and reported, and, in doing so, expressed an opinion adverse to Mr. Bradlaugh's claim. What proceeding did Her Majesty's Government then take? Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table and proposed to take the Oath. Objection was, however, taken to his doing so, on the ground that hitherto no man had claimed to affirm, or had been granted the privilege of affirming instead of taking the Oath, except upon a recognized religious objection. The fact was that Mr. Bradlaugh's own conduct had distinguished his case from that of everyone else. When Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table and claimed to take the Oath, the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) most properly objected; and the propriety of his objection was proved by this circumstance—that the Prime Minister immediately moved for the appointment of a second Select Committee—a Committee that was to inquire into precedents and into the state of the law, and again to express its opinion to the House. Here, again, in the case of this second Committee, the right hon. Gentleman had departed from the previous practice of the House. And what was the result? The first Committee—the Committee appointed to inquire whether by law Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to affirm—reported that he was not one of the persons entitled to affirm; and the second Committee—the Committee appointed to inquire whether he might take the Oath—reported that he was not so entitled. Upon that the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) proposed a Resolution in the Committee which was utterly beyond the Reference, and yet the majority of the Committee were so biased that they adopted it—that the decision of the first Select Committee should somehow or other be referred to the Courts of Law. But how that reference was to be made did not appear. This, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought, was but a poor return on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury—a member of the Jewish persuasion—for the special favour which Parliament had conferred upon his co-religionists, when it altered the law in 1858, and allowed the admission of Jews to seats in that House. That was a very poor return on the part of a Jewish Member of the House, who had been sworn upon the Old Testament, that treasure of which his race were the appointed keepers, and whom he would remind of the words with which the Psalm xiv. in that sacred Book began—"The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." He repeated, that a Jewish Member's favouring the admission of such a person to the House was but a poor return for the favour which Parliament had conferred upon his people. This he (Mr. Newdegate) knew—that if Mr. Alderman Salomons had been now alive, instead of taking the part in this matter which had been borne by the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury, he would have supported the decisions of the two Committees, and voted emphatically for the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh from a seat in the House. After having for years, under the late Lord Derby, opposed the admission of the Jews to Parliament, on the ground that to admit them would invalidate the Christian character of the House; after all his opposition to that measure he (Mr. Newdegate) became acquainted with Mr. Alderman Salomons, and told him that the chief ground of the late Lord Derby's and of his opposition was that they feared the admission of unbelievers; and Mr. Alderman Salomons replied that he should be as much opposed to their admission as any Christian Member of the House could be. The House was now asked to pass the Resolution which had been proposed by the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) for admitting an avowed Atheist; and it was understood that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to support it. What, then, was he to understand? The Government had used their majority to empower two Committees to report their opinion—a function which had never before been committed to any Se-

Mr. Newdegate

Committee of the House on such a point. They expected, he supposed, those two Committees—or, at all events, one of them—would have ruled in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh's admission. But both Committees reported against Mr. Bradlaugh's claim. What was the Government to do? They proposed to set aside the opinion of those Committees, which they themselves had appointed. It appeared to him, however, that if the House had, as they thought, got into a disgraceful position, they had to thank Her Majesty's Ministers for their unfortunate conduct. They had granted unprecedented powers to those Committees. Those Committees had reported adversely to the opinion of the Government, who were now about to set aside the reports of both the Committees, which they themselves had appointed. It appeared to him that the Government were seeking to evade open and direct action. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. John Bright), said during yesterday's debate that the Nonconformists were in favour of the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. He (Mr. Newdegate) represented in some sense the same constituency as the right hon. Gentleman, North Warwickshire included Birmingham; and he had already received three intimations that the right hon. Gentleman had misrepresented the views of the Nonconformists. Many of them, at all events, had declared themselves adverse to the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh; a Petition from the Wesleyans was lying on the table deprecating his admission. It appeared to him, then, that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was another attempt to confuse the House. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of the Quakers, the sect to which he himself belonged, and seemed to draw a parallel between that which was done by the House in their case and what was happening now in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. He spoke as if they were parallel cases, and quoted the words of Mr. Wynn, whom he (Mr. Newdegate) well remembered in the House, and of the Attorney General of 1833, when a declaration was framed and taken by Mr. Pease instead of the Quakers. But there was no parallel between the cases. He (Mr. Newdegate) held the Report of the Committee of 1833, which was appointed to inquire into the case of Mr. Pease, in his hand, and it showed that from the time of Charles II. the Quakers had been recognized as a Christian sect. They came under the Act of Toleration—the first of William and Mary—and had subscribed the profession of faith in these terms—

"I do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ, his eternal Son, and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for evermore, and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine inspiration."

Then the 7 & 8 Will. III. c. 4, which further met their case as Christians, when they applied to be admitted to certain Offices. Parliament, therefore, in their case, had before it these Statutes, which admitted the Quakers to offices, and all they had to do was to frame a declaration which would admit them to the House. They did not go to statutes with respect to the Law of Evidence for precedents. They did not do what Mr. Bradlaugh's friends were doing; they did not travel out of the real issue to establish a precedent, or appeal to statutes passed for a different and in no way analogous purpose, like the Acts relating merely to evidence, as Mr. Bradlaugh had done; but acted upon statutes made to admit Quakers to certain municipal offices, and adapted the declaration they made on accepting municipal offices so as to comprehend the substance of the three Oaths which at that time existed as the condition of entering Parliament; afterwards what was then done was confirmed by statute. There was no analogy, then, between the case of the Quakers and the case of Mr. Bradlaugh—none whatever—any one who examined the documents produced by the Committee of 1833 must come to that conclusion. He (Mr. Newdegate) feared that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham was trying to mislead the House. He had made an appeal to its sympathy and its Christian charity. One would have thought that what he asked the House to grant was some boon to an individual. He never spoke of the Oath which was taken in this House as having been enacted for great national purposes, as a matter of public policy, not intended to apply merely to any individual, but to the Representatives of the people. He never spoke of the Oath in that sense; but he seemed to ask the House to do this individual, Bradlaugh, a personal favour. It was one of the characteristics of ultra-democracy that the interests of the State were by it postponed to the interests of the individual. A short time ago he was reading a very able work upon the causes of the Civil War in the United States of America, and in that work the author points out that the predominance of individualism, which pervaded the laws of the United States—particularly of the Northern States—was one of the principal causes of that terrible conflict. That was the principle which the right hon. Gentleman was advocating now. He was asking the House to consider the case of this individual, Bradlaugh, as against the maintenance of those great Constitutional rules and laws by which this country had hitherto been governed, rendered free, great, wealthy, and fit to bear the sceptre of an Empire on which the sun never set. What said the author to whom he had referred with regard to this principle of individualism? He (Mr. Newdegate) was quoting from the History of the American Civil War, by John William Draper, and in Vol. I., page 21, he said—

“A self-conscious democracy, animated by ideas of individualism, was the climate issue in the North; an aristocracy, produced by sentiments of personal independence, and based upon human slavery, was the climate issue in the South.”

The author further said—

“Unquestionably, the absolute freedom of action conceded to the individual is not without grave disadvantages. It may be doubted whether a community organized on such a basis, more particularly in case this freedom is granted to women, can ever have the stability, or even be as moral, as one in which the family is the essential political element. But that such a community will have a prodigious expansive power is undeniable.”

Now the principle of English constitution had ever been to recognize the family. It was not this ultra-democratic principle of individualism that had formed the foundation of the State in England. But that was the principle which the right hon. Gentleman advocated—the right hon. Gentleman invited the House of Commons of England to prefer the pretensions of an individual to the interests and the safety of the nation. He would now glance for a moment at the Resolution which had been moved by the sitting Member for Northampton, and which the hon. Member had recommended on the strange ground that the House should become a party to an infraction of the law, in order that someone out of the House might prosecute Mr. Bradlaugh for penalties, and so to test the law, as was done in the case of Alderman Salomons, before the Exchequer Court in 1851. But there was a distinct difference between the position of Mr. Alderman Salomons and that of Mr. Bradlaugh. In the case of Alderman Salomons the House told him plainly—as it ought to tell Mr. Bradlaugh—“You cannot take the Oaths; in our opinion the law debars you from taking them.” Alderman Salomons thereupon retired from the Table to below the Bar. He consulted with his legal adviser, who recommended him to return to and vote in the House. Mr. Alderman Salomons did so; he sat and was held to have voted, while the House deliberated. What did the organ of the House, the Speaker, ultimately do? By the direction of the House he ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to take Mr. Salomons into custody, and to conduct him out of the House. Why did he (Mr. Newdegate) mention these facts? For this reason—that when the Courts were applied to in that case they were asked to support the decision of the House; but if the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton were carried, and Mr. Bradlaugh came and took his seat in the House and voted, if any application were made to the Court of Exchequer, that application would be made not in support of the decision of the House, but to contravene the decision of the House; and as Parliament was considered the highest Court existing in this country, the inferior Court would be asked to contravene the decision of the superior. Would not that be a manifest anomaly? The Courts had over and over again, in matters of Privilege, declined to act in contravention of the decisions of this House, even when those decisions were contrary to their own view of the law; because they held that the Privilege of Parliament was above the law, and that there was no Court authorized to interpret the Privileges of the House of Commons except the House itself. If

Her Majesty's Ministers imagined that the House was in danger of exceeding their powers—if Her Majesty's Government were in earnest and desired the opinion of the Courts of Law—they ought to oppose the Resolution of the hon. Member for Northampton, and devise some other means of submitting the case to the Courts. He knew not how that could be done; but he had been told that by some method this was possible. What right had the House to expect any individual to incur the risk and expense of instituting proceedings at law in this matter if it threw every impediment in the way of his success? Talk of reference to the Courts! He held that it was beneath the dignity of the House to encourage any man to violate the law, in order that someone outside might prosecute him to test the law. He had never, throughout the course of his Parliamentary experience, become acquainted with such a case. He had another objection to this appeal to a Court of Law. The question before the House involved matters over which no Court of Law could have jurisdiction. There was no limit to the debates and proceedings of the House, or as to the subjects with which it could deal, save those which were excluded by the Oaths which its Members took. They had all sworn allegiance to Her Majesty. They had all sworn that they would not dispute the succession to the Throne. They had no regular penalties decreed for offences that might be committed by Members of the House within it. They had nothing like a law against blasphemy; but the position of Parliament was this—and it is this—that distinguished a Parliament from a Convention, that each Member undertook by Oath to maintain the Monarchy and the succession to the Throne—before he could exercise any function, each Member had to take that Oath. Therefore, each of them was precluded by his own act at the very outset from doing anything, or devising or consulting about anything, with a view to the subversion of the Throne, or affecting a change in the succession. That was the manner in which they had secured their Sovereign upon the Throne of these Realms. But in the present case Mr. Bradlaugh had informed them, by a letter, to which his signature was attached, and which was appended to the Report of the second Committee, that the words of the Oath—that the whole tenour of the Oath which appealed to the Deity—was to him meaningless. There stood his own words appended to the Report of the second Committee. He alleged that he had tried to evade the Oath because, he thought it would be disrespectful in him to pronounce words which to him were meaningless. Towards the close of Mr. Bradlaugh's letter there were words which, had, he believed, not yet been noticed in the House. These were—

“I shall, taking the Oath, regard myself as bound, not by the letter of its words, but by the spirit, which the Affirmation would have conveyed, had I been permitted to use it.”

Now, let the House observe what followed—

“So soon as I am able, I shall take such steps, as may be consistent with Parliamentary business, to put an end to the present doubtful and unfortunate state of the law and practice on Oaths and Affirmations.”

So that Mr. Bradlaugh, if he were admitted, as he demanded—that was, as an unbeliever, an avowed Atheist—had announced that his first action in the House would be in direct opposition to the Oath, and, therefore, in the sense of Atheism. Who could pretend to feel surprise if, after such a plain announcement as this, Mr. Bradlaugh made some irreverent proposal, or should use Atheistic language in the House? If he were to make any attempt to impugn the Sovereignty of Her Majesty, that would be contrary to the Oaths of Members, and the Speaker would interfere to prevent it. But Mr. Bradlaugh was determined that the House should admit him upon his own terms—as an avowed Atheist—and with the assurance on his part that his first action in the House would be, if allowed, to palter with the Oath. If after he had thus entered the House, he assailed the Oath all others had taken with reference to the Deity, in the grossest terms, neither the Speaker nor the House could interpose to stop the outrage. Could the House be surprised, then, that there was objection on the part of the great majority of the people of this country—the Christian people of this country—to having their Representative Assembly perverted to such uses as that? This was by no means a light or trivial matter. An engineer, who had charge of some great embankment, which restrained some mighty stream, if he saw but a ripple through its base, at once took warning, and adopted precautionary measures, lest ere long he might see his dykes swept away, and such destruction as was recently experienced in Austria. Let the House, then, not despise this attempt on the part of the individual, Bradlaugh. It would be manifestly inconsistent if this House should fail in the tribute they now paid to the Deity—the Lord of Lords, the King of Kings—and continued to pay great deference to the Throne of an earthly, however estimable Monarch. This Atheism was no passive principle. That might be illustrated by the modern history of France. Within his (Mr. Newdegate's) own experience he had witnessed the Revolution of 1848, which swept away the Throne of Louis Philippe. In that Revolution, Atheistic Socialism bore a leading part. Louis Napoleon, afterwards Napoleon III., then became President of the French Republic, and afterwards, in 1851, carried out the coup d'état. During that time Lord Palmerston was Foreign Minister; remonstrances were made against the military executions carried on by Changarnier, under the orders of Louis Napoleon as President. Lord Palmerston declared that the action of Louis Napoleon in authorizing the execution of thousands of Atheistic Communists was necessary to preserve society in France from the outrages of Atheistic Socialism. For this Lord Palmerston was driven from Office by the Liberals. No one was so furious against these executions as M. Thiers; and as he could not restrain his wrath he was first imprisoned, and then sent out of France. Nineteen years of the Empire passed by, and then, through a rash and ill-advised foreign policy on the part of Napoleon III., the German War began, and the second Empire fell. Again, Anarchy—Atheistic Socialism—became rampant in Paris after the Germans had quitted it; the friends of order rallied round M. Thiers, as President of the Republic. From Versailles he tried to negotiate with the Socialist Revolutionists, but totally failed; and then he had to resort to measures of severity precisely similar in their character to those for which he had condemned his predecessor, Louis Bonaparte, as an enemy of his country. Louis Bonaparte, when President of the Republic, had repressed social anarchy by martial law; and M. Thiers, when he assumed that office, found himself compelled to do the same thing. Let no one try to persuade or attempt to tell him (Mr. Newdegate) that Atheism was a passive principle. The House might depend upon it that the First Napoleon was right when, after having been made First Consul, he came face to face with Atheism. What did he do? He found it essential to the work of restoring society, which in his time had been wrecked by Atheistic Socialism, to re-establish the Church of Rome in France. With this object he entered into a Concordat with the Pope, in which, however, he made provision for restraining the ambition of that Church. It was in defiance of many of his generals, and of many others who surrounded him, that he held the opinion that if society was to be re-established in France, a necessary condition, and preliminary thereto, was the re-establishment of religion. With the permission of the House he would read from Alison's history the words of the First Napoleon, and he was no little man. He said—

“The first Consul will appoint 50 Bishops. The Pope will induct them. They will appoint the parish priests; the people will defray their salaries. They must all take the Oath. The refractory must be transported. The Pope will, in return, confirm the sale of national domains. He will consecrate the Revolution. The people will sing ‘God save the Gallican Church!’ They will say, ‘I am a Papist. I am no such thing. I was a Mahommedan in Egypt.’” —[“Oh, oh!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I do not perceive the connection of what the hon. Member is saying with the subject before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the last few lines of the quotation he was making would show the connection. The conclusion of his quotation would be found to maintain the connection of his argument. Napoleon said—

“I will become a Catholic here for the good of my people. I am no believer in particular creeds: but, as to the idea of a God, look to the heavens, and say who made them!”

Such was the answer to Atheism, made by the First Napoleon. Such was the maxim on which he acted in re-founding government in France. It could not be said that the Emperor was the victim of any narrow religious dogma. And this he (Mr. Newdegate) would say to the House of Commons—it would be unbecoming on the part of the House to do so grave an act as that of admitting an avowed Atheist to sit in that House on terms of equality with its other Members; to allow the people of England to entertain any reasonable doubt with regard to the belief of their Representative Assembly in a Deity. If Her Majesty's Government had doubts concerning the law of the question, why had they not brought in a Bill to solve those doubts? They had appointed two Committees on the subject, both of whom had reported that the law was against the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. They had usually a majority in their favour; why, then, did they not bring in a Bill? In the case of the Quakers that was done. It was also done in the case of the Roman Catholics, and, lastly, in the case of the Jews. And if, now, they introduced a man to take his seat amongst them, who told them that he professed Atheistic opinions, and that he would use his utmost power to change the Oath—aye, against the retention of any Oath they had all taken—if this were permitted, it would effect a great change in the Constitution of this country; it would lamentably alter the character of the House. Her Majesty's Ministers ought at least to have the decency to consult the other branch of the Legislature. He deprecated any proceeding whatever in the sense of the Motion before the House; but at least Her Majesty's Ministers ought to proceed by Bill, if they wished to pass so grave a measure—they ought not to be allowed to effect such purpose in any disguised manner.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member for North Warwickshire has concluded his comprehensive speech by an appeal to the Government to legislate in this matter. That is a course which he thinks is quite clear we ought to take; but I find myself in the predicament of being of opinion that it is exactly the course which we ought not to take. If we considered that the provisions of the present law were insufficient to cope with the case which has arisen and to dispose of it, then, indeed, the case would be a very strong one for urging on the Government the duty of proposing legislation. But we entertain no such opinion. Some of us may believe that the House has no jurisdiction in this matter. Others may believe that it has jurisdiction in this matter; but those who think it has and those who think it has not—and I speak now more particularly for those who sit on this side, with whose views I am best acquainted—are perfectly agreed in the opinion that the present law is adequate for the purpose of dealing with this case. That being so, it is for those who consider that the difficulty which has arisen cannot be met by the present law to propose fresh legislation. But as regards the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, when he suggests that we should attempt fresh legislation, I apprehend his only meaning is that we should attempt a fresh controversy; because the doctrine which he has laid down, and which formed the entire basis of his speech, is one to the effect that those who have the misfortune—and the greatest of misfortunes it is—not to believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, ought on no account be permitted to sit in this House. He therefore invites us to raise that controversy at large, while we believe that the law which now exists is perfectly sufficient for dealing with the case of Mr. Bradlaugh, the case which has actually arisen. I cannot conceive anything more unfortunate, or less prudent, as a measure to be taken on the part of Gentlemen who must be supposed to have some care for the peace and order and dignity of this House, than a proposal, in the present state of the minds of men, to introduce an Act of general legislation in connection with the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. So much for the proposal to legislate in connection with his case. Now, I have been appealed to by the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Sir Hardinge Giffard) to supply him with guidance—that is the phrase which he did me the honour to use—on this subject. The office is one, however, which is very far beyond my aspirations or my duty. I should have thought the hon. and learned Gentleman did not require to look nearly so far as across the House in order to obtain what I should call very good guidance, and much better guidance than I can afford to him. I think the judgment of his late Colleague the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker), so far as I have been able to gather his opinion from his action on the Committee, a judgment well entitled to the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention. I deeply regret the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Preston from this debate. I should have thought that a Gentleman of his legal eminence, who had not only been Attorney General for a period of six years, but who discharged the duties of that Office with conspicuous ability, would not have declined to give us the benefit of his assistance on this occasion. But to the appeal which the hon. and learned Member for Launceston made to me, and which, within limited bounds, I shall be glad to answer, I will reply by a counter appeal, and ask why—it cannot be on Party grounds, because we have been repeatedly assured by hon. Gentleman opposite that this is not a Party question—I should have to notice, as I do with some surprise, the absence of an hon. and learned Gentleman of so much ability and so much authority as the late Attorney General from the discussions of this House on the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. I wish it to be understood in what position I, at least, think the Government stand towards the House in a matter of this kind. I believe it to be their duty frankly to offer the best advice in their power to the House. When they do that I consider they are functi officii. The appearance of Mr. Bradlaugh at this Table is no measure of ours. The dealing with his case is no question of our policy. It is not the result of our counsels. We are not bound by anything which he can do, or anything which he may decline to do, more than hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is our duty to come to the consideration of his case, as we think, with rigid and absolute impartiality. It is, in our opinion, our duty to banish from our minds a large portion—aye, the much larger portion—of the topics which present themselves to the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and which will evidently, for the most part, govern their judgments—topics which govern the judgment of my hon. Friend who has just sat down, that of the hon. Member for the City of London here present (Mr. R. N. Fowler), and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City who addressed us last night (Mr. J. G. Hubbard)—namely, that which is sometimes called religious instinct, and sometimes religious principle, by others a great question of Constitutional policy—whether it is right that an Atheist should be allowed to sit in this House or not. Now, I affirm that that is not the question before us. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

and "Oh, oh!"] Those audible though not articulate expressions of opinion only serve strongly to corroborate the assertion which I have made, that topics of a certain class, connected no doubt with a great principle of Constitutional legislation, but totally disconnected from the administration, application, and interpretation of the law, embrace doctrines which govern the minds, judgment, and actions of many hon. Gentlemen opposite in a case in which there is no question before them, except the just interpretation and application of the existing law. But be that as it may, I think it the duty of the Government, in circumstances for which they are not responsible, to give the best advice in their power, and then to leave the matter in the hands of the House. I do not know that I should have thought it necessary, after the general description I ventured to give on a former occasion, to address the House to-night were it not that I have the feeling that if the House should accede to the Amendment moved by the other side, it will probably be entering into a long, embarrassing, and difficult controversy, not so much, perhaps, within the walls of this House as beyond its walls, and that I feel I should not like to see the House involved in great difficulties, and, perhaps, running the risk of ultimate defeat, without being able to give myself the poor consolation, at any rate, of reflecting that I had endeavoured to counsel a different course which would have saved it from any such calamity. Now, I shall endeavour, in what I have to say, to avoid entirely whatever can stir feeling. If anything is to be done on this subject towards rightly directing the minds of men I am confident it must be by and within the limits of the powerful appeal made last night by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. My endeavour will be one quite distinct from his. It will be to argue this question drily, and not to say a word if I can avoid it that can needlessly debar the access which may be open, though I can hardly conceive it to be open, to the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, by mixing up the consideration of the case with matters which touch feeling that might lead to political excitement. I am painfully impressed with the belief that debates of this kind, as they are disagreeable to the House, so are not con-to the maintenance of its character and unity. But, at the same time, our duty is in our having such decisions. If we have them it is hardly more than that in any Assembly of this kind they should be conducted with more or less warmth. Where questions so solemn, so profound, and of such vital importance, as the whole of this issue, to the welfare of mankind, are at issue, it is almost impossible to maintain a calm and clear and bold view of the question. On the one hand, it is thought to be maintained, of decisions that turn upon the action of the House only and which, nevertheless, are vital to anything like a judicial consideration of the question. On the one hand, the hon. Gentlemen urged on by their consciences believe to be a duty for religion. On the other side, the hon. Gentlemen are urged—as my hon. Friend was last night—towards what they believe to be a duty of more importance to that religion itself—nay, to be vital to religion itself, namely, the cause of religious freedom.

When considerations of this kind are in view, I am afraid, amidst the weaknesses of human nature, it is hardly possible to resist the occasional intrusion of irritating topics; and I hope I shall not incur offence by saying that, so far as observation has gone in these discussions since the time when I resumed my seat in the House after the Election, there has not on this side of the House that intrusion of these irritating topics begun. ["No!"] That is a fact of history. I cannot forget that the first attempt made to raise these matters were introduced into discussion with respect to political questions which had no place whatever in the argument. Of course, I entirely agree with the hon. Member who introduced the subject of any intention to lead the judgment of the House; but, in my opinion, he had to some extent led astray himself. He had not resisted that fatal temptation which befalls all on an occasion of this kind, to mix with the true issue matter irrelevant to it which on account of its deep and profound interest forces itself upon attention. Although I most deeply regret what I have heard, I will tell the hon. Gentlemen opposite fairly that I appreciate to a certain extent, and I respect cordially, the feeling which has been prompted by their conduct. Let us see what are the questions before us. The hon. Member for Northampton proposes to pass these questions by a Resolution for the terms of which I am not in any degree responsible, but which has the effect of a refusal, on the part of the House, to meddle with this matter at all. I understand it as asserting an authoritative grant to Mr. Bradlaugh by the House of some privilege which it is the duty of the House to dispense—as an assertion that the House will not interpose to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from taking, in the first instance, what he may deem to be his statutory duty, in the form of a process of Affirmation. Well, now, the considerations which weigh on my mind with regard to this subject are these: First of all, if the House has a jurisdiction in this matter to make any examination of the case further than providing that an exterior and formal duty has been performed, it is a jurisdiction which the House has never exercised, and a jurisdiction which it would be most impolitic on the part of the House now to begin exercising. Secondly, speaking for myself, I confess I go further. The more I have looked at this case the graver appear to me to be the arguments which go to prove that in the sense of the law and the Constitution, as it has been asserted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Sir John Holker), the House has no jurisdiction at all. I agree with the sentiment delivered last night, and fortunately in a thin House, by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) and as I agree with his other opinion, so I agree with this, that while he does not for a moment contest the power of the House to proceed within its walls to whatever conclusions and action it may please, he contested the Constitution, title and right of the House to do that which was described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) last night, when he spoke of our statutory obligation to see that Members were rightly seated. The view of that right hon. Gentleman was, not merely that we were here as witnesses to perceive and attest and secure the fulfilment of something written down in Act of Parliament; but it is to see that the Oath which is taken is rightly taken, or that the Affirmation which is substituted for it is an Affirmation rightly affirmed.

These are wide words indeed, because right swearing and right Affirmation includes the relations of the person swearing or Affirming to the Oath he takes or the Affirmation he makes. This is a matter which, I think, is beyond our cognizance, and is no part of the statutory obligation imposed upon us or the statutory power intrusted to us. If we possessed this jurisdiction, I conceive it would be most unfortunate that we should undertake to exercise it. Surely, Sir, we are exceedingly unfitted in these deep matters of belief to do so. Are we not conscious, every man for himself, of the tendency within us to be heated in our views and judgments on such points? I have promised to guard myself, as well as I can, against the intrusion of feeling; but I am conscious it requires the keeping of a continual curb upon those propensities, upon those susceptibilities of mind which are almost resistless, and which tend to introduce themselves into these discussions. A popular Assembly rightly accustomed in its ordinary debates to appeal to feeling, accustomed to use feeling as the minister of reason with perfect justification—aye, and with absolute necessity—in the discharge of our functions, I hold that we have anything but a high qualification for dealing with a matter which ought to be viewed in the driest light of reason, and in no other light whatever. If we undertake to interfere for the first time with a Gentleman who proposes to fulfil at the Table of this House what he thinks is his statutory duty, we may find ourselves engaged in two conflicts, into neither of which do I feel either bound or disposed to enter, not being led thereto by obligation nor by precedent. I am not willing to enter into conflict with the Courts of Law, nor am I willing to enter into conflict with the constituency of Northampton. Of the first of these possible conflicts the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) appeared to make very light. I can well understand that an action cannot be brought against the House of Commons. I am not, however, so clear that no action can be brought against the servants of the House of Commons, whom it employs, and whom it orders to exercise its will. We have precedents for such actions; and it appears to me that if such actions arise their result would depend not so much upon the power of the House as upon the ultimate judgment which the public outside this House may form upon the wisdom and prudence of its conduct. Still less am I willing to be led into a conflict with the constituency of Northampton. This House for a long series of generations has been commonly successful whenever it has found it needful to enter into controversy with the Crown or the House of Lords; but there is a most marked contrast between the issue of these controversies and the lamentable issue of its one great conflict with the people of this country as represented by one of the constituencies of the country—a constituency numerically smaller than Northampton. It is impossible to doubt that when the subject of Wilkes's writings in The North Briton first came before Parliament about the year 1763, a great deal happened which is happening now. The general conception of Mr. Wilkes was, that he was a man open to great exception with respect to personal character, and it is not unnatural to believe that the reaction of feeling excited by that idea concerning Mr. Wilkes tended much to govern the first judgment of the House of Commons in that unhappy contest. The House embarked itself in that controversy. You are still uncommitted. You declined to embark in that controversy when the first proposal was made by proposing to appoint a Committee. You are now asked to embark yourselves in that controversy. Consider a little with what confidence your predecessors a century ago entered into a controversy not dissimilar to the present. Consider what was the final issue of that controversy. You carried everything for years before you with a high hand. You set Wilkes at defiance; you set the constituency for which he sat at defiance. You actually seated in this House the man who had received a minority of the votes of the constituency, because you said that he was the qualified candidate and must sit in preference to one who was disabled. But what was the issue? By degrees you found that that was a conflict in which you could win little and might lose much. The energies that impelled you grew more and more slack. Then the House of Commons ceased to act against Mr. Wilkes after resisting him three times. He took his seat unquestioned in this House in the year 1774.

how your action will be interpreted out-of-doors." These words raised great suspicion in my mind. I am not willing in a matter of personal, civil, and religious right to be arrested in my consideration of the case, or to be guided in that consideration, by being told to look and see how my action will be interpreted out-of-doors. Our business is to look straight at our duty in the case, and then to trust to the generosity and the justice of our countrymen as to the way in which they will regard our action. I am not, therefore, willing to exercise jurisdiction of this kind with a serious hazard of being brought into positions that I cannot beforehand define, and with respect to which the light of former history, as far as it is available at all, tends to show that the end of all our resistance may be disastrous and ignominious failure. With regard to the precedents in this case, it is admitted that there is no precedent for interfering with a gentleman who comes here and claims to perform a statutory duty in terms of the Statute. I do not think that hon. Gentlemen have perhaps quite realized the historical importance of that fact; because, pray remember that the Jacobites took their places in this House, and that Mr. Shippen and Sir Robert Walpole exchanged their jests on the subject across the Table, at a time when the Oath bound the man swearing to most solemn duty to the House of Hanover. But the Jacobitism of Mr. Shippen and others was as notorious as the Hanoverianism of Walpole and his friends. And yet the House of Commons, even in those days, would not come between a man and the Oath, but permitted the man to swear, though they knew, and knew beyond all doubt, he was a Jacobite. In the same manner Bolingbroke, without any religious belief at all, lived and died in great distinction, and his Parliamentary career was certainly not put an end to by the action of this House. He was followed by many more, and that at a time when this House was not only Theistic, Christian, and Protestant, but intimately bound with the Church of England. Such, however, was the aversion of the House to this interference, and such the tenacity with which they adhered to the words famous since the days of Elizabeth, "Not we to examine," that even in these remarkable times they would not institute the smallest investigation, or stand between a citizen and the full enjoyment of his right. It may be said that there are precedents for the interference of this House in respect to the Oath, and no doubt there are; but they are precedents in precisely the opposite direction from that which is now contemplated. Every one of them is a precedent in favour of the person who is desirous to swear, and not against him. The House has assisted in overcoming obstacles as far as it could in favour of those who tendered themselves to swear or affirm at this Table. Never has the House gone against them. But there is another observation to be made with regard to these precedents. Not only have they been in favour of the person tendering, but they have been entirely and exclusively referable to his exterior action. Nothing about an investigation of a man's belief or the citation of his belief by the House has ever entered into the question. When my right hon. Friend (Mr. Spencer Walpole) says that we are under a statutory obligation to see that Members be rightly seated, I must challenge my right hon. Friend to produce the evidence of any such statutory obligation as would require us to investigate a man's belief. Our statutory obligations are limited by the letter of the statutes, and now let us see what that letter is. It appears to me that the prudential and legal reasons and arguments of the Attorney General and others who have spoken on this side are ample to govern the House in its decision of this question. I must go a little farther—as far as my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread)—and ask the House to consider what is the nature of the jurisdiction which the House considers to belong to it. I hold that it was well defined by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) last night, when he said the House were to be witnesses to a certain performance in its exterior jurisdiction—that was, the exterior performance of a certain civil duty of which the law has made us stewards. I do not question for a moment that we have that jurisdiction—to see exteriorly that a certain duty is well and rightly performed. That seems to be involved in the nature of the case; but there are many considerations which tend to show that this House has not the racter of the constitution. That era was closed by Jewish emancipation, if, indeed, it can even now be said to be absolutely closed, because I am under the impression that even at this moment another branch of the Legislature reserves for decision within its own discretion the question whether this or that particular Jew shall be allowed to take his seat upon the Benches. Here, however, we meet Jews, included on a footing of perfect equality; and now, Sir, as was justly and truly said by my right hon. Friend last night, we are invited to make what I suppose is a final rally for the Theistic constitution of the House. We have been driven from the Church ground; we have been driven from the Protestant ground; we have been driven from the Christian ground; and the final rally is made upon this narrow ledge of the Theistic ground. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, whether it is a narrow ledge or not, you have given up your Church, your Protestantism, your Christianity. You are outside of them altogether, and you are standing on what ground remains to you outside of them. What is that ground? How was it described by the Mover of the Amendment? The Mover of the Amendment said he would have been most happy if Mr. Bradlaugh had come to this Table and had taken the Oath or Affirmation without making any declaration upon this subject. But who is Mr. Bradlaugh? Did the hon. and learned Member obtain his first information about Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions when Mr. Bradlaugh made his claim to make the Affirmation? Was there any fact in England more notorious than the fact of Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions? Therefore, see whether your ground is narrow or not. You are not now taking your stand for Theism in a definite and dogmatic form. You are declaring your willingness that an Atheist should sit here, provided he had not told you what he was in the course of some of the proceedings of the House. Surely, Sir, it is a very narrow ground. The form of actual Atheism is, so far as I know, a rare form of unbelief in this country. The forms which abound are known rather by the names of Positivism, Agnosticism, Materialism, and Pantheism. You are not taking objection to any of these forms. I do not understand you to say that if any gentleman published in every newspaper in London, on the morning that he was going to take the Oath, a declaration that he was a Pantheist, an Agnostic, or anything else, there would be any reason why he should not take his seat in this House. That makes good what I say—that the religious ground on which we stand is a narrow and slippery ground. For my own part, I see no profit or advantage either to charity or to reason, or to common sense, in making distinctions of this kind. In accordance with your principles, if I understand them, you would allow a Mahomedan to sit in this House without question; you would probably allow a Parsee to sit in this House; but you could not, with any consistency, allow a Buddhist to do so. Well, I am not willing to engage in a controversy whether, with a Mahomedan and a Parsee on my left—[Dissent!—] and a Buddhist on my right—I am afraid I have not successfully sounded the depths of the minds of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, for I gather from that cry that those Gentlemen are also prepared to introduce another new form of religious controversy, and that objection is to be taken on religious grounds to Mahomedans and Parsees. Well, there is a theory that it does not matter what God you worship provided you worship some God or other. In my opinion there is greater danger of irreverence and impiety in this kind of loose, rambling debate, clutching at some remnant of what we on this side of the House think to be intolerance, than there is in any frank acknowledgment of the absolute separation that has been drawn in the spirit of the law of this land, and, I believe, in the letter of the law of this land, between civil duty and religious belief. I fully accept that principle with entire fearlessness, which I, for one, am conscious of, as to the civil as well as religious consequences. It seems to me that, seeing the extreme thinness and slipperiness of these distinctions between Atheism which is notorious and Atheism which is avowed at a particular place, we are asked to tread upon very dangerous ground; and I mistrust altogether the issue of the contest into which we are plunged under the influence of the feelings which suggested those distinctions. I must make one remark upon what fell from an hon. Member who spoke from the Opposition Benches last night, and who said—"Look and see how your action will be interpreted out-of-doors." These words raised great suspicion in my mind. I am not willing in a matter of personal, civil, and religious right to be arrested in my consideration of the case, or to be guided in that consideration, by being told to look and see how my action will be interpreted out-of-doors. Our business is to look straight at our duty in the case, and then to trust to the generosity and the justice of our countrymen as to the way in which they will regard our action. I do not question for a moment that we have that jurisdiction—to see exteriorly that a certain duty is well and rightly performed. That seems to be involved in the nature of the case; but there are many considerations which tend to show that this House has not the breadth of jurisdiction that is so largely claimed for it. Why is it that a Parliamentary Oath is imposed by statute? Why, when the Oath began, in the reign of Elizabeth, was it not administered by the authority of the House? Because the House had no authority. Why is it that you do not administer Oaths in your Committees? Because you have no authority to administer oaths. What is the traditional distinction between a Committee of the House of Lords and a Committee of the House of Commons? Because the presumption is that we can have no power whatever except what the statute gives us. Why, again, when Oaths were first imposed, were they taken before the Lord Steward? Why for 130 years did this House never hear of the Oath? and yet that Oath was yet precisely the same in its purpose and effect as it is now? Why, again, when this House began to witness the Oath, was the function of the Lord Steward continued? Because, as I understand, from the time of the Revolution, from the first year of the reign of William and Mary to the first of William IV., the obligation was cumulative, and Members took the Oath not only in this House, but also before the Lord Steward. Well, the enacting of the Oath by statute, the administration of the Oath before the Lord Steward, and the joint administration of that Oath before the Lord Steward and the House, are arguments to show that the House has here only a Ministerial duty to perform, and that duty is defined by the precise language of the statute, and by the inferences to be justly drawn from that language. What is the language of the statute? It does not state that the House of Commons or the House of Lords shall each of them be invested with power to require of their Members that they should take certain oaths. It does not constitute the House of Commons the Minister of the Legislature, with authority to act for and on behalf of the Legislature, and with a delegated power making the House masters of the whole circumstances of the case. The statute has not intrusted the power to the House of Commons. It is a duty imposed upon a citizen; and the spirit of the statute is there in obvious conformity, as it seems to me, with the reason of the case. What can be more reasonable than that the jurisdiction of the House of Commons over its Members should really begin at the time when they have practically become its Members? A man elected by a constituency is in no other sense a Member of this Assembly than in the sense that he is on the way to become a Member. He is potentially a Member of this Assembly, but not for our purpose; with him we have nothing to do until he has taken the Oath. Consequently, what can be more rational than that the real jurisdiction of the House over this man should begin when he is a Member of this Assembly for the practical purposes for which the Assembly meets? What says the statute—

“Whereas it is expedient that one uniform Oath should be taken; be it therefore enacted that the Oath to be made and subscribed by Members on taking their seats shall be in the terms following.”

And then it is provided that the person who is bound to take the Oath shall take it. There is no legislation investing the House with any power; but there is legislation strictly binding the Member to fulfil his duty to the constituency who elect him. The statute binds him for that purpose; and it is provided by the 3rd section that in a sitting of the full House the Oath shall be publicly made and subscribed by every Member of the House. It does not say it shall be administered. It says it shall be made and subscribed by the Member with the Speaker in the Chair; and then comes a phrase on which I follow the interpretation given by the legal Gentlemen. It is provided that each House shall have the power of regulation according to such regulations as such House may by its Standing Orders direct. I understand we are unanimous in believing that those words refer to matters entirely exterior, and do not give any authority to the House to go between a man and his conscience. There is not a word in the statute to invest the House of Commons with any function but that of hearing and witnessing the mere performance of certain exterior Acts. I do not understand, claiming no authority, how we are to get over the case of the 5th section. If it was intended by the Legislature to put this jurisdiction into the hands of the House of Commons, why not leave it to the House of Commons to enforce that jurisdiction? It is obvious that if the House of Commons was to be thus empowered, it should likewise punish the kind, to decline a responsibility which did not belong to us, and to refrain from usurping an authority which has not been placed in our hands. I will not trouble the House further. I will express the hope that I have not given offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I claim for us that if our feelings are stirred and governed by anxiety for religious liberty, we have yet, in the intellectual and reasoning processes that we have gone through, adhered closely and strictly to the law. That same respect I cordially offer to those who sit on the other side of the House; but I do beseech them to put guard upon themselves to prevent the infusion into this deliberation—this solemn deliberation—of matter which has no genuine or legitimate concern with it; and if the principle of moral duty requires to be enforced by the dictates of prudence, I do beg of them to consider what have been the unhappy issues of previous attempts by the House to take into its own hands, being a single branch of the Legislature, powers which were never accorded to it by that which alone is its superior—namely, the law of the Realm.

MR. GIBSON: I desire, Sir, to offer some remarks on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I entirely coincide, and so do my hon. Friends who sit near me, in the desire that this question should be considered from an impartial point of view, and without any reference whatever to the political views and prepossessions of the Member for Northampton. The right hon. Gentleman, when he said he would avoid all irritating topics, forgetting who was sitting by his side, suggested that all those irritating topics had come from this (the Opposition) side of the House. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented]. I accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that he did not mean to deny that a right hon. Gentleman sitting beside him introduced irritating topics. Unquestionably the speech delivered last night by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) was characterized by as much bitterness, as much acerbity, and as complete an absence of toleration and charity as any speech which I ever heard in any Assembly; and the Chancellor of the Duchy seemed to consider that unless you agreed with him and sat on the same side of the House as he did himself, it was impossible to entertain an upright motive, to feel a single pure aspiration, or to be actuated even by common honesty. Therefore, Sir, I think I am right in guarding myself from admitting that at any stage of this discussion all the irritating topics have been confined to this side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House said he would discuss this question as a dry question of law. I do not know exactly what is the meaning he attaches to the epithet "dry;" but certainly his statement was anything but the statement of a dry question of law. It was, of course, a very eloquent speech; but although I listened to it both with the attention and respect due to any speech coming from a statesman of his position, yet I failed, with all the training which my profession has given me, to find out what was the definite legal advice, or the precise legal argument that he desired to be followed by the House. He stated that no new law was necessary to enable Mr. Bradlaugh to come to the Table and be sworn; and he then proceeded to argue with great force and great persuasiveness that it would be very inconvenient to have a new law, and that it would be almost more convenient to break or to strain the existing law than to face the inconvenience which its alteration presented. [Dissent.] Of course, he did not say that he was so urging any breaking or straining of the law; but he so dwelt on the vast inconveniences that would result as to lead the mind of hon. Members almost irresistibly to the conclusion that anything would be better, and that we should try to adapt our institutions in such a way as to avoid the vast difficulties which he suggested. Now, what are those difficulties? I listened to them, and I am not at all frightened by them; they are open to an obvious answer. Following the lead of Mr. Bradlaugh in the Select Committee, the right hon. Gentleman tried to influence and terrify the House by relying on the precedent of the Wilkes's case, as if there was the slightest analogy between what the House of Commons did in Mr. Wilkes's case and what it is now asked to do by the temperate Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston. In Wilkes's case the House of Commons declared that Mr. Wilkes was incapable for his conduct of being re-elected. Who seeks to apply any such rule to Mr. Bradlaugh? We do not, in the slightest degree, question the right of the constituency of Northampton to return Mr. Bradlaugh, nor his right to be returned by that constituency. Our contention is narrower and more logical. We say that under the existing laws, as they stand, it is impossible, without their alteration or amendment, that Mr. Bradlaugh can take his seat. We take up no line of non possumus, as the House of Commons did in Mr. Wilkes's case, when it both rejected him and said it would never accept him at all. We only say—"We admit that you have been returned as a Member; but according to the existing law you cannot comply with the prescribed forms, and therefore you cannot sit." Where is the analogy between that and the precedent of Mr. Wilkes? The other bugbear has been put forward that you will get into conflict with the Courts of Law. Is it the hon. and learned Member for Launceston who seeks to get the House into a conflict with the Courts of Law? If you do what is suggested by his Amendment, no Court of Law can possibly assail what is done. You will get into conflict with the Courts of Law only if you accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton. If you adopt the course suggested in the original proposition you will unquestionably embark in a conflict with the Courts of Law, the end of which no man can foresee. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister admitted that he was bound, as its Leader, to give the House some guidance in the difficult and painful dilemma in which we are placed. And what was that guidance? He said that we are now standing on the narrow ledge of a Theistic test; and I think the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster used an almost equivalent expression last night. That may be a question to be discussed when a Bill is brought forward for that object; but no one is now seeking to impose any new test. Our argument is simple. We say—"Apply the existing law, construe it liberally and generously; do not apply it in a narrow or exclusive spirit, but do not wrest or change it." It is not a question of introducing a test or a pledge; but one of the construction of plain and clear Acts of Parliament. What is the argument of the right hon. Gentleman? As far as I could gather, his view was in favour of the last contention of Mr. Bradlaugh—namely, that he should be allowed to take the Oath at the Table of this House. The right hon. Gentleman did not say which branch of the question he was in favour of; but his whole argument went to this—"You are a mere external body; your rights are limited to seeing that the external forms prescribed by the Act of Parliament are observed. Mr. Bradlaugh's last demand was to take the Oath; you have no right to prevent him from taking the Oath." I ask at once, is not that entirely inconsistent with the whole action of the right hon. Gentleman from the beginning to the end of this unfortunate occurrence? If the question be so plain as he states it, why did he send it upstairs to be discussed by a Select Committee? But it was the contention of those who contested the appointment of the last Committee that the question was so clear, so free from precedent, and required only the application of two or three sections in the statutes, that it was not a case for a Select Committee, but one for the immediate decision of the House. That contention was denied. The right hon. Gentleman said—"No; you must have a Select Committee; it is an intricate question on which there must be a search of the Journals, and the House has a right to have it considered by a Select Committee." But the right hon. Gentleman has thrown over the decision of the Select Committee, and also the clear opinion of his own Law Officers. When the question was before the House last, on the 21st of May, the whole contention of the right hon. Gentleman was—"I am a layman; I do not set up to be a lawyer; this is a nice, delicate, difficult question of law." Yet he wishes now, on what he contended, and even still contends, is a pure question of law, to throw over quietly in the House the opinion of his own Law Officers. The question was raised in the Committee with precision on this point. There can be no doubt about it; because a proposition was submitted to the Committee to the effect that no precedent had been shown in which the House had refused to allow a Member to take the Oath on account of his views of religion, and that the House could not constitutionally refuse permission to take the Oath on such account. Now the right hon. Gentleman has adopted that proposition. It contains the clearest and most concise statement of his argument. But against that proposition there voted in the Committee 16 Members—including the Attorney General and the Solicitor General—while only five voted for it. And now I gather from the right hon. Gentleman's argument that if Mr. Bradlaugh comes to the Table of the House tomorrow and repeats everything he has said he would permit him to take the Oath. That, I think, the right hon. Gentleman cannot logically deny. In what position are we now? If we are merely ministerial machines—if you, Sir, are a mere lay figure in the Chair, then we shall have to look at Mr. Bradlaugh's performance as unreasoning beings. But if we are to apply our understanding, our reason, to what was implicated in his original statement, and what was the clear meaning of the letter of the 20th of May, which he wrote and sent to all the newspapers in London—if we are to consider these things, are we to exercise no judgment upon them? There is a clear dilemma on this point. Either we are ministerial machines, as the right hon. Gentleman said—in which case Mr. Bradlaugh can come forward and take the Oath or the Affirmation as he pleases—or else we are to exercise some judgment, and then we are responsible. We must be either responsible or irresponsible. There is no middle place. As far as I can understand the right hon. Gentleman, he has hardly made up his mind even yet on this question; although his whole argument, if it meant anything, meant this—that we had no jurisdiction to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh taking the Oath at the Table. Am I misrepresenting the argument of the right hon. Gentleman? No dissent comes; and, therefore, I say that I am entitled to assume that the right hon. Gentleman gave this guidance to the House—If Mr. Bradlaugh comes to the Table and takes the Book in his hand, you, Mr. Speaker, are a lay figure, and you, the House of Commons, must do nothing but look on the performance. I took down one sentence of the right hon. Gentleman. He said—"You have no jurisdiction to do more than see the exterior observance of the form." Was the House of Commons ever before told it was in such a contemptible and degraded position? What is the meaning of this in the face of the 3rd section of the Act which has been read by the right hon. Gentleman, the Parliamentary Oath Act, 1866—

"The Oath shall be solemnly and publicly made and subscribed by every Member of the House of Commons at the Table in the middle of the House, and while a full House is there sitting with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, at such hours and according to such regulations as the House may by its Standing Orders direct."

My proposition in reference to that is clear, has never varied; the House is by that section distinctly made the guardian of the Oath—is bound to see that it is taken under solemn and public conditions, with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, and in a full House; and it is reminded of its duty to deal with this question by Standing Orders. Can that section have been framed for the sole purpose of making us unintelligent and irresponsible witnesses of an act which the vast majority of both sides in this case would regard as a kind of blasphemy? The right hon. Gentleman's argument, if it means anything, means this—that he is willing to allow the Oath to be taken by a person who has intimated, by necessary implication, that that Oath will not be binding upon his conscience. Mr. Bradlaugh published the letter now before the House, in which he said he would not take the Oath as meaning an appeal to God; that the words "So help me, God" were a meaningless addendum, and that part of the Oath was an idle form. That is the guidance—the sole guidance—we are to receive from the Leader of the House on this difficult and delicate question. I venture to think he will find a great many on this occasion will assert their independence. Never, I believe, from the beginning of his speech, did the right hon. Gentleman use the word "affirm." I again assert that the whole and sole argument which the right hon. Gentleman gave for the guidance of the House was this—that we could not—we ought not—we had no jurisdiction to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the Oath. The right hon. Gentleman knows the circumstances—nobody better. He has read that letter of the 20th of May, and so has the country. He knows what Mr. Bradlaugh said at the Table; and, knowing all this, he has given us the advice to which I have referred. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a saying of the illustrious scientifically make. The argument of hon. Members opposite is this—We will assume that the Report of the first Committee was right; but, as the difference of opinion amongst its members leaves it open to question, in order to prevent the House being involved in a delicate and, possibly, a painful inquiry, do not prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from going through this form, so that eventually the question may be settled in a Court of Law. But what I want to know is whether any Court of Law could effectually settle this question? I should like to hear the opinion of the learned Law Officers of the Crown upon this point. I am satisfied that they would not give it as their opinion that a Court of Law could settle the matter, unless it was so fenced round with qualifications as to make it nearly worthless. Let us look at the particular form of Affirmation which Mr. Bradlaugh would have to take. It is the one set forth in the Act of 1866, and it runs as follows:—"I, Charles Bradlaugh, solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm," &c. In other words, he would use the very words that are prescribed by the statute, and at the time and in the place prescribed by the statute. In such circumstances, I should like to know what would be the fate of an action brought to recover penalties against Mr. Bradlaugh? We are now asked to divest ourselves of all responsibility, and to blindly hand over this question for decision by a Court of Law, which might never determine the question at all. If Mr. Bradlaugh were sued for penalties, the first step in the proceedings would be to put in the Records of the House, from which it would appear that, equally with the right hon. Member for Birmingham the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Mr. Bradlaugh had made the Affirmation prescribed by law. I have read the statute closely; and I say that it has been too lightly assumed that a person has only to walk into Court and to enter an action for penalties against Mr. Bradlaugh to be certain of success. The difficulties in the way of such an action are very great. He would have taken the statutable words at the time and in the place indicated by the statute; and would not the Court say—"We must assume in a penal action that the House of Commons satisfied itself that an unqualified person did not take the Affirmation." It could hardly be contended that his Affirmation under such circumstances was a nullity. The whole argument of the Attorney General was founded upon this proposition—that the question raised is a nice and a difficult one, and that we should get rid of a painful and a disagreeable subject by handing it over to the Law Courts. But how is this question to be handed over to the Law Courts? Who is to be the prosecutor? Will the Attorney General undertake to commence and carry on this action for penalties against Mr. Bradlaugh? The Attorney General is not divested by the Act of last Session of his responsibility in such a matter, and he is as much technically as the Irish Attorney General is actually the Public Prosecutor of the country. Is it intended that the matter shall be left to chance or to any individual who shall volunteer to proceed, in the same way as it has been left to any person to proceed against those who issued the Liberal Circular? Is the House of Commons to evade a decision on this question without its being certain that the question will be raised and decided elsewhere? I venture to tell the House of Commons that it cannot so divest itself of its responsibility. Every time that Mr. Bradlaugh sits and votes it will be open to any hon. Member to move, night after night, that a new Writ be issued for the borough of Northampton; because the Act says that, in addition to such penalty, the seat shall be vacant, as though the person elected were dead. The issuing of the Writ in no way depends upon whether the penalty has been recovered. This, then, is the way in which it is suggested that we should get out of the difficulty attending this very nice and delicate question—namely, that we should avoid collision with the Law Courts by handing over the whole question to them. There is another point which I was surprised to find left unnoticed, having regard to the vast experience of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread.) The words contained in the Report of this last Committee, in its unauthorized clause, were that we should "not prevent" Mr. Bradlaugh from going through the form of making an Affirmation. Now, I beg the House that there shall be no play on these wretched words, "not prevent;" for it must not be forgotten that if we do not prevent we permit, and if we permit we sanction; and it be contended for a moment being permitted and sanctioned Bradlaugh making an Affirmation. Table, we might not be asked to justify him from the consequences of an action that might thereafter be taken against him? I believe this will close without that statement seriously encountered. It may be that, and the House may be told the question is a nice and difficult one. I repeat that if the House decides the making of an Affirmation by Bradlaugh, it will be bound to meet all events, with great respect to applications for the indemnity of Mr. Bradlaugh against the expenses of the act which he is now taking. Indeed, he may do more; the Prime Minister has said that Mr. Bradlaugh may take his choice, and if he chooses to make an Affirmation instead of the Oath, all those who are of the opinion that the best thing that can be done is to be somewhat grateful to him for sparing us part of his performance. Last night the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer based his argument on the fact of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to affirm upon the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. I will assert that there is no analogy between the two cases. Mr. Bradlaugh was a Quaker, and the Select Committee which dealt with his case had to consider three statutes under which it was laid down that the Affirmation of Mr. Bradlaugh was to be taken in all Courts and other places in which an oath was taken, allowed, or required. The nature of the Affirmation was not confined to a Court of Law. The nature of the Roman Catholic was decided by the Prime Minister, and the hon. Gentleman to whom I have referred, and, as I believe, with the view of stirring up the old animosities which existed with regard to that subject. I shall not refer to them in detail; but I would just mention that, as also that of the Jews, in order to point out that when the difficulty concerning them it was dealt with by a side-wind which would over-throw statutes and precedents as in the present case. This is a question which can only be dealt with logically and not by the use of new legislation, and that is what I say ought to be done, in order to meet the arguments, pro and con, may be carefully and candidly weighed. Whatever we do, I hope it will not be thought that the House can escape its responsibility by giving a blind vote. Let the House take an honest and straightforward course: give effect to, or reverse the decision of, either or both of the Committees, and not in a cowardly, un-English fashion, seek to evade its duties and responsibilities by degrading itself into a mere piece of mechanism, a kind of conduit pipe to a Court of Law. I pray the House not to put its laws and privileges under the feet of Mr. Bradlaugh, as it is invited to do; and, for my own part, I shall decline—having stated my opinions and the reasons for them—to be a party to what I believe would be a plain violation of our laws. I shall vote against Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to make an Affirmation which would violate the law of man, or to go through the form of taking an Oath which, in his lips, would outrage alike the laws of man and God.

Mr. W. FOWLER said, that it was clear that the House was in a position of great difficulty. On the one hand, it was hard to see how Mr. Bradlaugh could take the Oath after claiming the right to affirm, because he had already affirmed under Acts of which no one could avail himself without stating that an oath was not binding on his conscience; and, on the other hand, a Committee had decided that he could not legally affirm. The last Committee had recommended the House to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to do an act which the former Committee had treated as illegal, and this was a very disagreeable position. He had felt great doubts, but had come to the conclusion that it was his duty to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton. He regarded the Amendment as a Motion for the expulsion of Mr. Bradlaugh in another form. Hon. Members said to themselves—“We won't have this man as a Member at any price,” and so they used the Oath as a means of expulsion. He could understand the strong feelings of hon. Members opposite, like the Members for the City who had spoken; but he thought that if there was to be a Motion for expulsion, it would be only fair to wait till the Member had taken his seat, and could reply to what was said against him. He objected to the use of an oath as a test. These Parliamentary Oaths were never meant as tests. Moreover, they were most imperfect as tests, for it was notorious that there were hon. Members in that House who held similar views as to the non-existence of a God with Mr. Bradlaugh, who had, nevertheless, taken the Oath. So it was now, and so it always had been. Moreover, Oaths were never demanded from Members until the 5th Elizabeth. He quoted the Preamble and clauses of that Act to show that these Oaths were then imposed on Members merely to secure the safety of the Crown from disloyalty, especially in reference to the members of the Church of Rome. But the Oaths had been used as tests against one set of men after another—the Friends, the Catholics, the Jews—and now, at last, they were sought to be used to secure the presence of only those men who believed in “some God or other,” as the hon. Member for Portsmouth put it. Feeling the difficulty of the case, still he could not sanction such a proceeding. He felt that it was their duty, as Christians, to act fairly and justly towards all; and though they were told by Members opposite that the House would be put into a very awkward position if Mr. Bradlaugh were allowed to affirm, on the other hand, if they did not, they would have a repetition of Wilkes’s case, and an unseemly contest with the electors of Northampton. The House would certainly be defeated if it entered on that sort of contest. The case against Wilkes was a very strong one; but, as they had heard, the House had to yield and to expunge the record. No one would suspect him of any sympathy with the opinions or proceedings of Mr. Bradlaugh; but he felt that justice and fairness between man and man demanded that he should be permitted to take his seat, taking, of course, on himself all the risks that might thence arise. He thought that of the two difficulties, that of allowing him to affirm was the less, and he should vote for the Motion.

SIR HENRY TYLER remarked, that nearly all that could be said on the subject had been admirably stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and no one could put it better. But a few points had been left untouched, to which he wished to direct the attention of the House. Now that the two Committees had reported they were left face to face with Mr. Bradlaugh; and the question was, whether he was to take his seat on making an Affirmation, or was to be prevented from making an Affirmation or taking the Oath? Considering the way in which Mr. Bradlaugh had presented himself—first claiming to make an Affirmation, and then proposing to take the Oath—it was natural and proper for them to inquire, and they were entitled to inquire, who and what was Mr. Bradlaugh, who thus asked to be received in the House in an exceptional manner. It was not, as had been stated, that the House was inquisitorial, or that from previous knowledge of Mr. Bradlaugh or prejudice against him they desired not to admit him. He was convinced that if Mr. Bradlaugh had presented himself at the Table, and had quietly taken the Oath without making any unusual claim, or otherwise obtruding himself, or drawing special attention to his position, he would have been allowed to take his seat without interference from anyone. But Mr. Bradlaugh, by the course he had adopted—by proposing first to affirm, and, secondly, to take the Oath, and by his letter, which could not be too often quoted, declaring that in taking the Oath he would be taking something which to him was “a meaningless set of words”—had put himself in such a position that the House was asked to treat him in an exceptional manner. And who, then, was this Gentleman who asked to be treated thus exceptionally? A number of precedents had been adduced from time to time applying to Quakers, Moravians, and Jews, but none to Atheists. But it was not the question merely of an Atheist which was before them. It was a question for which there was absolutely no precedent—that of an Atheist who was not merely an Atheist, though he had been described from the opposite Benches as a poor persecuted man with a conscience, who desired to do what was right, and to affirm in the manner most proper and convenient to his conscience. Mr. Bradlaugh was not such a man. He was a man whose livelihood, whose profession for a series of years, had been to disseminate cheap and pernicious literature among the mass of the people. That was the man who came to that Table and asked the House to treat him in an exceptional manner. When this question was discussed on a previous occasion, and it was proposed to appoint a Committee, he ventured to produce some pamphlets published by Mr. Bradlaugh, and he was called to Order for reading from those pamphlets. But he believed he should be in Order when he mentioned that those pamphlets had not only the name of Mr. Bradlaugh as being written by him, but had on the back that they were printed and published by Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant. He held those pamphlets in his hand. He was not going to trouble the House with them. But they were evidence of the statements he had made, and the contents of the pamphlets were such that if Mr. Bradlaugh were admitted to the House he should be very much surprised if some hon. Gentleman did not rise in his place and propose a Select Committee to inquire whether, having regard to those writings, Mr. Bradlaugh was fit to be a Member of the House. On the last occasion when he quoted a passage from one of those pamphlets, Mr. Bradlaugh went to his constituents in Northampton, and in the course of a speech which he made, remarked upon his (Sir Henry Tyler's) "mad antagonism," and said that the pamphlet from which the quotation was made was not his at all. He could only say it had Mr. Bradlaugh's name on the face of it, and his name, with Annie Besant's, as printers and publishers on the back. He did not know what better evidence he could have. He found it in the catalogue of Mr. Bradlaugh's and other works—"the 300,000th catalogue." He sent a clerk to Mr. Bradlaugh's publishing office for it; he found it and other pamphlets there; and if Mr. Bradlaugh denied the pamphlet to be his he ought to take his name from the front and the back of it. The fact was that Mr. Bradlaugh could not come into the House without bringing Annie Besant with him, because he observed that her name was on the back of all these pamphlets. A great deal had been said by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench of religious liberty and Christian charity. What was Christian charity? If Mr. Bradlaugh were starving it would be Christian charity to give him food; if he was in need or necessity to help him in other ways; but surely it was not Christian charity to admit him to take an Oath which he characterized as an unmeaning ceremony—a ceremony which would be as outrageous an insult to Almighty God as could be performed. So, with regard to religious liberty, he had seen Turks in the heart of Bosnia spreading their carpets on the grass, and performing their devotions for 20 minutes before taking rest or refreshment after a ten hours journey; and he could respect Mahomedans and others for the conscientious performance of the duties of their religion and the way they performed those devotions; but how could he respect a man of this description, who first pretended he could not take an oath because it was not binding on his conscience, and, when he found he could not get in otherwise, professed his readiness to take it? They were threatened with legislation on the subject. Was it possible that hon. Members would be persuaded to adopt exceptional legislation to admit such a man to that House? Much might be said on one side or the other, as to the necessity for, or expediency of, retaining the Oath in its present form; but he must say he valued the Oath now more than ever, because it might be the means of keeping such a man out of the House.

MR. MELLOR could not help saying he had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir Henry Tyler) with unfeigned regret. He could not conceive that any good could be attained by the course he had followed. The hon. Member rose in his place and, in the absence of Mr. Bradlaugh, made all sorts of attacks upon him. He referred to pamphlets, and said things which really had nothing to do with the question before the House. The House was called upon to exercise a judicial function, and he hoped they would approach the duty in a judicial spirit. He had no sympathy with the views and feelings of Mr. Bradlaugh, and he deplored the fact that any hon. Member should entertain such sentiments; but in this free country Mr. Bradlaugh was just as much entitled to his views, however unpalatable or revolting they might appear to others, as he was to his, and he ought to get credit for holding them conscientiously. The question was what was the best course, under all the circumstances, for the House to take? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) said last night that Mr. Bradlaugh had pressed his views on the House. With great submission, that was hardly so. He came to the House, and, being most certainly aware of the feeling that would be created if he proceeded to take the Oath, he claimed to affirm. He was acting in what many believed his strict right. What course did the House take? A Committee was appointed—not to decide the question, not to bind, but to assist the House—to look into the Act of Parliament and to examine precedents. There was considerable opposition on the other side; although the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) had assented to the Committee, the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) objected to the Members being nominated, and raised an excited debate, in which unfair attacks were made upon Mr. Bradlaugh and considerable feeling was aroused. The result was that among the various religious communities throughout the country the question of religious liberty was raised, and the feeling prevailed that if Mr. Bradlaugh was to be excluded to-day it might be their own turn to-morrow. The question was, what were Mr. Bradlaugh's rights? That depended on the construction of the Act of Parliament. They had heard from the hon. and learned Member for Launceston, and the right hon. and learned Member for the Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), a great deal of argument and some declamation; but the real question was, what were the rights conferred and the duties imposed by the Act? The Act imported that every Member should take the Oath—he must do so. Mr. Bradlaugh, feeling that obligation, came to the Table. But if the Oath were objected to Affirmation might be made; and the Act went on to specify those who might do so. The words were—"All who by any law for the time being are entitled to affirm." After the passing of the Parliamentary Oaths Act in 1866, he maintained that "every person who by any law is entitled to affirm," must mean that those who were entitled to affirm in Courts of Law were entitled to make Affirmation in the House of Commons. The decision of the first Committee was not binding on the House, and when their Report was placed upon the Table Mr. Bradlaugh asked to be allowed to take the Oath.

Mr. Meller

The hon. Member for Portsmouth objected, and with that objection he entirely sympathized. If, indeed, the question were that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to take the Oath, he should, if he thought the House had any jurisdiction to interfere, vote against his being allowed to do so. But the House had, in his opinion, no such jurisdiction. They had no right to inquire into the motives, the conscience, or the religious views of any person who presented himself to take the Oath. If they were allowed to do so, they might raise a debate as to the religious belief of any hon. Member coming to the Table to be sworn. That, he thought, would be a great national misfortune. The only duty, however, cast upon the House by the statute was to see that the Oath was taken in the ordinary form; and the Act provided penalties—the vacating of the seat and the payment of a fine of £500—in the case of any Member who was not entitled to affirm sitting without having taken the Oath. If Mr. Bradlaugh were willing to take the risk of affirming, and they allowed him to do so, he would be pursued in an action before a Court of Law, where the real construction of the Act of Parliament could be settled. There would be no difficulty in finding a plaintiff. The difficulty would arise from there being too many. Mr. Bradlaugh would be pursued for voting and sitting in the House without taking the Oath. He would answer that he was one of those persons who were excused from taking it, and allowed to substitute for it an Affirmation. Then the Judges would determine whether he was so excused. The House would thus have the Act authoritatively interpreted. He thought it a pity the House of Commons could not now call in the Judges to give their opinion on a point of law, as the House of Lords used to do. But, as they could not do this, the adoption of the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was the best course for them to adopt.

MR. RODWELL said, he had listened with somewhat painful interest to the debate which had taken place, and did not hesitate to say that a great many things had been said on the other side in which he concurred, and that some observations had fallen from hon. Members on his side with which he could not altogether agree. His hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down had urged that, as Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to affirm in Courts of Justice under the Act of 1869, he was, under the provisions of the Act of 1866, entitled to affirm in that House. He took issue on that point with his hon. and learned Friend, who would see that the Act of 1866 twice used the word "solemn" — "a solemn declaration" and a "solemn affirmation." [The hon. and learned Member then referred to the Act of 1869, and read the 4th section of that Act, which provided that the affirmation should only be admitted when the presiding Judge was satisfied that an oath would have no binding effect upon the witness's conscience.] He would observe that the word "solemn" was omitted from that Act. In the previous Act the word "solemn" was to be found twice. The words of the Act of 1866 were intended to make an affirmation equivalent to an oath. The mere ordinary words of a promise were not admissible by the Act of 1866. When words were deliberately omitted from an Act of Parliament something was intended by such omission; and he felt that the absence of the word "solemn" from the Act of 1869 was significant. What was the object of the Act of 1866? It was not simply to relieve Quakers, Moravians, and others; it was really aimed at excluding persons in Mr. Bradlaugh's position. The Declaration which was to be in lieu of the Oath was to be as solemn as the Oath; and the same circumstances which prevented Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the Oath prevented him also from taking the Affirmation. If he could not take the Oath he could not take the solemn Affirmation. A profession of some religious faith was requisite in either case. He did not wish to use a merely technical argument; but he thought that if words were carefully introduced into one statute and omitted in another, some importance ought to be attached to the circumstance. The very terms used in the Act of 1866 presumed that the person making the Affirmation had some religious faith. He was anxious not to say a word which would wound Mr. Bradlaugh's feelings; but he believed that within the meaning of the Act he was not competent to make anything more than a bare promise; he was incapable of either making a solemn declaration or of taking an oath.

The hon. Member for Northampton had urged, with some plausibility, that it was sought to impose a religious test; but it was not really so. There was nothing in the Act of Parliament which required any question to be put as to what a man's religious belief was. It only asked a person to profess some religious belief. The words quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) from Lord Holland were susceptible of a different interpretation from that of the right hon. Gentleman. He believed that Lord Holland meant to convey that a Member should be required to acknowledge that he had some religious belief, and that the passage quoted was a confirmation of the views which he was then expressing. He did not share in those views which had been expressed as to the paramount necessity of respecting a large and important constituency. The constituency of Northampton knew when they elected Mr. Bradlaugh that they were raising difficult and delicate questions, and they must take the consequence. He thought that due regard ought to be attached to what had been termed the religious instinct of the country. He believed that people were asking themselves whether the House of Commons was going to assist Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. He agreed that the constituencies were looking with interest upon the result of the division, but not in the sense in which hon. Members had said so. He had himself been urged, especially by one class of Dissenters—the Wesleyans—to vote against Mr. Bradlaugh's admission to the House. He felt bound to vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton; and if action were taken to procure Mr. Bradlaugh's admission, he should prefer that it should be done directly rather than by a side wind.

Mr. A. MOORE said, he had not intended to take part in the debate; but after what he had heard he intended to say a few words. He felt it his duty, and the duty of every man in the House, to speak out plainly and firmly. They had had nothing but lawyers from beginning to end, and he thought one of their calamities was the rapacity with which those hon. and learned Gentlemen had occupied the time of the House. The question was not a tribunal question or a legal question—it was a broad and simple issue, and those who involved it in legal technicalities were doing nothing but throwing dust into the eyes of the country. The point really at issue was this—Great Britain being a Christian country by the Constitution and the Common Law, were they to allow an avowed Atheist, who thrust his opinions before the House and the nation, to take part in the government of this country? If they did so, why was it? Because the people of the country wished it? He did not believe they did wish it. He could not answer for the people of England and Scotland, though he did not believe either of those countries were in favour of it; but he could answer for Ireland. Was it because they wished to create a new precedent? If that was so, and they wished to create a new precedent, contrary to the time-honoured usages and customs of the House, why did they not create a new precedent in the case of poor Mitchel and O'Donovan Rossa? One at least of those gentlemen was an educated man, and neither of them had spent his time in attempting to pollute the minds of his fellow-creatures. He had been very sorry to hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) the night before, and he thought it was the most mischievous speech he had ever heard in the House of Commons. He had tried to lead the House on a great number of false issues, and he was of opinion that it would have been far better if he had not made the speech at all. Hon. Gentlemen had quoted the Catholic year; but the Catholic year had nothing to do with the case before the House at all. For many years Catholics were excluded purposely from sitting in that House; but because it was just to allow Catholics who had been unjustly excluded from that House to enter, did it follow that it was just to allow an unbeliever, an Atheist, contrary to all usage and precedent, to do so? Another argument had been that a Quaker was allowed to take his seat in the House after making an Affirmation; but the hon. Member who had just spoken had called attention to the fact that the sanction of the Oath and the sanction of a promise were in essence the same, although in form the Oath was more solemn, because it expressed a belief on the part of the person who took the Oath in the existence of a Supreme Being; but what sanction did the hon. Member for Northampton offer who believed in no Deity and in God? He thought the House ought to take a broad view of the question. It ought to feel that it had its own dignity and the dignity of the people to consult; and he did not believe that in allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to enter the House they would consult either the one or the other. He thought that they had already heard a great deal too much on the matter. Let them look all over the habitable globe at millions of subjects of different nations which this country was called upon to rule differing in customs, manners, and institutions; but all universally uniting in the worship of one Supreme Being. Those subjects and nations looked to this country for freedom and protection, for guidance and light; and he asked the House was that the first message they were prepared to send out in the plenitude of fulness of their strength and youth, to be one which should exalt an Atheist and dignify an unbeliever? He did not believe it, and in his humble voice he should oppose the Motion, believing that it had in itself the germs which would lead to the degradation of the House, and which would bring disaster and disgrace on the country.

MR. FORESTER also thought the House had heard quite enough of legal arguments. The question was whether they should admit within those walls one who not only professed Atheism, but who had shown in his writings that he would be willing to overthrow the Throne and the Constitution. He (Mr. Forester) believed that the country had gone backwards in the forms of Christianity under the present Prime Minister. For his own part, he protested against the admission of a man who not only repudiated the claims of our Royal Family to the succession to the Throne; but repudiated the claim of the King of Kings and the Creator of the Universe to the united homage and undivided allegiance of the God-fearing Representatives of a Christian people. Turning to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, he said that the right hon. Gentleman was apt to pose as the embodiment of the Christian virtues of charity, tolerance, and forbearance, yet seemed never to miss an opportunity of saying somefied in the case of Alderman Salomons. No; it was because the Catholics and the Jews long pleaded, argued, and claimed as Catholics and as Jews that they had a right to representation in the Councils of the nation. And nobly and manfully did they bear the penalty for many a weary year of the open and fearless avowal of their belief. If ever the day came—which God forbid!—when the Atheists of this country should be as numerous as the Jews, the Nonconformists, and the Catholics, and when, imitating the courage and manliness of the Jews, the Nonconformists, and the Catholics, they should insist and claim as Atheists to come in there, then the House would have to consider their demand. But then they would be face to face with an Atheism which had the courage of its convictions, and not with the furtive thing which confronted them there that night, which sought to steal into that House; which first would not swear and then would swear, which sought to pick the lock, not to force the gate. The Catholics of Ireland struggled long for admission to the House of Commons, but he was not afraid to say that they would have preferred to remain outside the portals for another century rather than purchase their admission by asking for the overthrow of the religious foundations of the nation; so highly did they value the sanction of religion, even in the view of the State, as consolidating society, and making the organization of a nation something better than an agglomeration of individuals. He honoured the men opposed to him in this debate who were not defending Mr. Bradlaugh's Atheism, but who, he was convinced, were, according to their own view, defending that doctrine of "civil and religious liberty" which had admitted many of them to that House, as it had admitted himself. But he honoured also, and all his sympathies were with those Gentlemen on both sides of the House, who, although they knelt at a different altar from him, still stood up for that great principle which gave its name to Christendom, and which could not be blotted out from the history of the world without sending them back to Pagan barbarism and darkness. He was sure that in speeches they had heard in that debate there was a gloomy foreboding for England. Under the name of freedom of thought, and under the name of religious liberty, scepticism and infidelity, speculative or practical, had made more ravages in English society than England would wish to recognize. And greatly he feared that if they came to a decision that night to admit Mr. Bradlaugh—who himself, not they, raised this painful question—they would change the whole current of English political history, they would materially alter the whole character of the Constitution. Let him warn the House against the argument of the Prime Minister that they must have no test that would wound a man's conscience. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean by conscience? Look across the Channel where the oath proposed to be taken by the Army was only "upon my honour." Would the Prime Minister allow Mr. Bradlaugh to say—"I pledge my honour that I intend to pay allegiance to the Queen?" He adjured the House to answer the present Motion by standing upon the lines of the present Rules as they existed upon their books. If they oppressed men's conscience, he, for one, would cheerfully consent to their being, by subsequent legislation, put in harmony with the generous policy which he hoped always to follow. But he protested against an interpretation of the Rules which would plainly violate them. With these words he had, at all events, discharged a duty, although a painful one, to his own conscience, to the constituency he represented, and to the country from which he came. Let no one say, if the Irish Catholic Members were seen in the Lobby with Conservative and Liberal Gentlemen who would vote against this Resolution, that they were Ultramontane bigots who preached an exclusive creed and intolerance. He who made that accusation against him must tell him whether any constituency in England or Scotland had sent to that House a Roman Catholic to represent it. He spoke as one of the Representatives of one of the most Catholic constituencies in Ireland, which had elected as his Colleague a Protestant. The county of Mayo, in which 90 per cent of the inhabitants were Catholics, sent a Protestant minister to represent it in that House. Let them not be charged with bigotry if to-night, as Christian patriots, they joined with their Protestant fellow-citizens in standing up for a recognition of the Christian's God.

debates had been occupied with a special Resolution for the benefit exclusively of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh. If the Resolution was carried, the House would not touch any of the numerous issues raised in the speech of the Prime Minister, who seemed to have entirely underrated the importance of what he called the narrow line upon which they were arguing the right. For his own part, he should refuse to continue these arguments in the Nisi Prius strain. They had had too much of it already, though he disclaimed any intention to undervalue the usefulness of contributions to the debates of the House from Members of the Profession to which he had the honour to belong; but he must point out the fact that the great Constitutional issues determined by Parliament for the last 200 years had been decided by the non-legal element in the House, representing the broad feelings of the nation, which was able to rise above what were sometimes the narrow lines of legal argument. They had no right to strain the Forms of the House, either to exclude Mr. Bradlaugh or to admit him. If Mr. Bradlaugh had come to the Table on the first day, with all the other Members, and had taken the Oath, it would have been a tyranny from which he should recoil for anyone to rise in the House, and, because of acquaintance with the out-of-doors writings or opinions of Mr. Bradlaugh, step between him and the Book. They had no power and no right to set up an inquisition in that House into any man's conscientious belief, or to try him by the decrees of the Council of Trent, by the Thirty-Nine Articles, or by the Westminster Confession. Outside the House the hon. Member might be a speculative Republican, or a speculative Rationalist or Freethinker; but the House ought not to try him for any of these views. There were only two tests put to a man at the Table of the House; one of them political, and the other religious. And there he joined issue with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who would ask them to sweep God from the contemplation of their proceedings. They might be Home Rulers, Conservative, Liberal, or Radical; they might hold any political opinion as to the destinies of this country save one—they must pledge their fealty to the Monarchy, as at present constituted. That was a political test. They must, to that extent at least, be Monarchists. Then, the religious test was linked with the political test for the purpose of strengthening and making more obligatory that political promise. In that sense, their rule required them, in the letter and in the spirit, to affirm a belief in the existence of a Supreme Deity, who would judge them hereafter, and it was because they invoked Him to mark their declaration of fealty to the Sovereign that the religious was linked with the political test on admission to that House. With that recognition of the Most High, a man might hold any religious opinions whatever on entering that Assembly. He denied, historically, that ever the Rules of that House contemplated the entrance into it of a man refusing to acknowledge the Supreme Being. That House was a representation of the nation. They were not dealing with a community, established on a new basis and on new theories. The British Constitution had grown, and was not made; that nation was built on the Christian theory of the family. The speech of the Prime Minister, and the Motion before them, invited them to regard the Members of that House like the directorate of a limited liability company. An hon. Member was, forsooth, analogous to the director of a railway, whom the shareholders had elected. He must be admitted, for he came there to manage the affairs of the company. That was the exalted conception presented to them of that ancient Senate. The House, he maintained, was founded on a nobler, a more ancient, and a higher conception than that. It was a Representative Assembly, in which men believed that the wisdom required even to rule a temporal Realm came from the Most High, and which commenced its deliberations by invoking the Divine blessing. But they were told that the House had altered its tests. Was he, as a Roman Catholic, to be charged with intolerance and want of generosity in the course he took that night? The alterations in the tests had never been made to relieve the embarrassments of an individual, but in obedience to the claim of a large class or section of the community. It was not to relieve that individual Catholic, Mr. Daniel O'Connell, in 1829, that the test was altered by Parliament. It was not to oblige an individual Jew some 20 years ago that the test was again modi-

we are not the House must restrain the High Court of Justice from proceeding, or it must itself pay the amount of the penalty and of the costs imposed upon Mr. Bradlaugh. It must be remembered that this was not Mr. Bradlaugh's case; it was the case of the House itself involving its own Privileges. He protested against that House being made a catspaw of in order to ascertain the rights of Mr. Bradlaugh. If he believed that he was in the right, let that Gentleman follow the example of Alderman Salomons and have a qui tam action brought against him in order that his right might be determined by a Court of Law. In reference to the large question which had been raised outside the legal point—namely, whether the House intended, or did not intend, to take a course which would have the effect of partially disfranchising the constituency of Northampton, he wholly denied that there was any parallel between the cases of Mr. Bradlaugh and those of Wilkes and Luttrell. In the case of Wilkes the action taken was that of a Parliament who had determined at any risk to keep out of the House a man who had been returned by a constituency, but who was obnoxious to the Crown and to the Minister of the day; but the House had at length to yield to public opinion. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to cheer ironically; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the accident of Mr. Bradlaugh's election for Northampton did not express the public opinion of England. He, for one, declined to treat the tempest in a tea-cup at Northampton as an expression of public opinion. If ever the Atheistical opinion of England was expressed by the election of Atheists, then would be the time to deal with the question, and to act by legislation and not by Resolution. That time had not yet arrived, and he should, therefore, feel bound to vote in favour of the Amendment; though, in so doing, he should separate himself from those with whom he uniformly acted.

MR. COHEN said, that he had always entertained the view which had been expressed by the Prime Minister, and he did not think that the House of Commons ought to interfere with a man who had been elected, and who came forward prepared to perform that which was his statutory duty. He should not have addressed the House on the present occasion, but for the fact that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken expressed the extraordinary opinion that the Judges in the Courts would not act in opposition to a Resolution of the House of Commons by ordering Mr. Bradlaugh to pay penalties consequent upon sitting and voting in the House. As far as matters of privilege were concerned Parliament had a right to adjudicate, and it could also pass Acts; but the power of adjudicating upon legal questions raised under such Acts rested with the Judges in the Courts before which cases came. On the general question he maintained that the taking of the Oath or the making of an Affirmation was no part of the procedure of the House, but was simply a ceremony of which the Members who happened to be present at the time were accidental witnesses. He admitted that this was a difficult question. As far as he could judge, he was inclined to the opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh was not entitled to Affirm. ["Hear, hear!"] But when hon. Gentlemen said "Hear, hear!" did they not know that very eminent lawyers held that Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to Affirm? It was a grave and difficult legal question, and one which a Court of Justice, and not the House of Commons, ought to determine. If the Courts of Justice decided that Mr. Bradlaugh was not entitled to Affirm and to take his seat he would be liable to a penalty, and his seat would become vacant. He did not know whether he would be re-elected; but if he were, and came to the Table of the House prepared to take the Oath, he should like to hear the distinguished lawyer who would say that any hon. Member could object to his doing so. What possible harm, he would ask, could it do to leave the question under discussion to the decision of a Court of Justice? The past history of the country showed that the House had got into a position of considerable difficulty when it attempted to interfere with the rights of constituencies; and he could not help thinking that hon. Members ought to be grateful to the Prime Minister, who had given the House fair and full warning that Mr. Bradlaugh would at his own risk present himself at the Table and make an Affirmation, seeing that if he was not entitled to Affirm the Courts of Justice

MR. SYNAN said, he declined to allow his judgment to be warped by an appeal to passion. He was glad to see this matter liberated from the Odium Theologicum, and confined to a legal question. He denied there was any analogy whatever between the case of Mr. O'Connell and that of Mr. Bradlaugh. In 1828 the Roman Catholics asked to have the law altered in deference to their religious opinions; but here was a man without any religion, and who openly avowed his contempt for all religion, not asking to have the law changed to meet his views, but alleging that by law he was entitled to affirm. Instead, then, of there being any analogy between the two cases, they were, he maintained, the very converse of each other. If the speech which the Prime Minister had made in the course of the evening had been made when Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table and had offered to take the Oath, it would have been unanswerable; but the House had exercised jurisdiction on this matter for a month, and it was too late for the Prime Minister to say now that it had no jurisdiction in the matter. The question whether Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to make an Affirmation having been referred to a Committee of the House at the instance of Her Majesty's Government, the Committee made a Report adverse to his claim; and now the Prime Minister and other right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench said that the House had no right to have interfered in the matter, and that Mr. Bradlaugh, and Mr. Bradlaugh alone, was the judge of whether he was a proper person either to make an Affirmation or to take the Oath. The House, however, did intervene a second time, and the question whether Mr. Bradlaugh was entitled to take the Oath was referred to a Committee, who, in a rider appended to their Report in reference to a matter which did not in any way come within the scope of their inquiry, recommended the House to evade the difficulty by permitting Mr. Bradlaugh to make an Affirmation, and so to shift the responsibility from themselves on to the Courts of Law. Mr. Bradlaugh based his claim to affirm upon the Act of 1866, which allowed Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists to make an Affirmation; but nobody else under that Act was entitled to affirm instead of taking the Oath. The Evidence Act was passed four years after, which gave a right to persons whom the Judge might decide ought not to take an oath, as it would not be binding on their conscience, to make an Affirmation. But how could that Act apply to the House of Commons? The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had been compelled to assume in his argument that the Speaker was in the Chair as Judge; but that assumption was absurd and ridiculous. The hon. Member appealed for justice, and, in reply, he (Mr. Synan) begged to say in the words of Portia to the Jew—

Thou shalt have justice more than thou desirest.”

The Speaker was the Chairman, and he had no right to put an Affirmation or put an Oath to any Member. No doubt the position of things was critical and unpleasant; but the man who had brought such a state of things about was Mr. Bradlaugh himself. It was not, therefore, open for Mr. Bradlaugh to blame the House for acting upon its conscientious opinion, and for supporting its dignity, its rules, and its laws. It was for the House to decide who was entitled under the laws and regulations of the House to sit in it, and what was the law which was to regulate its proceedings; and it was not to be forced into taking any step not authorized by that law in consequence of any outcry that came from Northampton or elsewhere. There was no doubt that under the Acts of Parliament Mr. Bradlaugh was not entitled to make an Affirmation; and the only doubt that had arisen on the matter was caused by the rider to the Report of the second Committee, which was intended to afford a loophole through which the House might escape from the difficulty in which it had involved itself, and throw the responsibility of deciding this question upon the Courts of Law. The House, however, had no power so to shift its responsibility. Was the High Court of Justice to be asked to decide this question adversely to the Resolution of the House? When did that House permit a Court of Law to decide upon the validity of its proceedings? Were they to establish a supreme jurisdiction in the highest Courts of the land to decide upon the law of Parliament as in America? If

(Mr. John Bright). Whatever happened, he hoped the Resolution would be upheld which he himself formerly proposed, and which had been affirmed by the Committee chosen by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in the few remarks I am about to make, I can assure you that I shall use no language calculated in the smallest degree to promote any feeling such as has been expressed on some occasions during the last two evenings, but that I shall adhere strictly to the terms of the Motion before the House. The Motion is simply that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm at this Table, and the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) proposes that Mr. Bradlaugh should not be permitted either to take the Oath or to make the Affirmation. The Amendment is said to be founded on the Reports of the two Select Committees which recently investigated this subject. At first it will, of course, appear to all hon. Members that, considering one of those Select Committees distinctly recommended that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm, it is difficult to found upon that recommendation the suggestion of the Amendment that he should not be allowed to Affirm. But we have the answer suggested by the other side that the Committee which made the recommendation that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm went beyond the Reference to them in making that recommendation, and that, therefore, it was not necessary for the House to follow them in that advice. Now, I wish to remind the House precisely of what the Committee did. The Chairman, my right hon. Friend the senior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), brought up a Report dealing almost exclusively with the question of the Oath. With regard to nearly the whole of that Report, I had the honour of voting with my right hon. Friend. There were some amendments suggested in the form of that Report; but those amendments practically did not touch its substance, and, as far as the Committee were dealing with the recommendations of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and myself throughout supported those recommendations. But the last sentence of the draft Report of my right hon. Friend was in these words—

“Whether it will exercise its right and jurisdiction with reference to the claim now brought before it”

—which was the claim to swear at this Table—

“is a question which, as your Committee perceive, has not been referred to them, and they, therefore, confine the expression of their opinion to those parts of the case as to which their opinion has been asked by the House.”

What followed upon that? My right hon. Friend proposed emphatically to pronounce that the House had only asked the Committee to report what the House might do with reference to the Oath, but not to report what the House ought to do. Thereupon, three amendments were put before the Committee—one in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), another in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), and the third in the name of an hon. Member on this side. In the teeth of the advice that we should not include in our Report any recommendation as to the course the House should pursue, my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge was defeated by a majority of 11 to 10. An addition was then made to the Report by a considerable majority to the effect that the proper solution of the difficulty was to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to make an Affirmation. I wish to make it perfectly clear that we were forced into that position by the draft Report of the Chairman being defeated by Members mainly sitting on the other side of the House, whose rejection of the Chairman's advice forced us to make a definite recommendation to the House. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston says that Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be allowed either to take the Oath or to affirm, “having regard to the proceedings of the two Select Committees.” Now, the first Committee decided by 8 votes to 8, or, as two Members were absent, by 9 to 9, and, taking into account the casting vote of the Chairman, by 10 to 9, that a person in the position of Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be permitted to might decide that he was liable to a penalty, and that his seat might be vacated. The question was not whether it was wise to allow an Atheist to take his seat in the House of Commons, but only whether an Atheist who had avowed himself an Atheist could not sit in the House. Persons well known to be Atheists had taken their seats in the House without objection being taken; and he asked, therefore, if there was not something of technicality in the contention that, because a man happened to avow Atheism in the House, he should not be allowed to take his seat?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had concluded the elaborate peroration of his speech by requesting the House not to adopt the recommendation of the hon. Member for Portsmouth; but the Resolution which he proposed was to the effect that Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be allowed to take the Oath which he asked to be administered to him, while the Committee recommended that he ought to be prevented from doing so. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham accused him (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) of endeavouring to establish an Inquisition, and asked him what he would do if a Positivist or a Comtist presented himself to be sworn. Well, the question was already answered in Taylor on Evidence, where the law was stated to be that a man must be assumed to believe in God unless he declared the contrary. No one, indeed, could have challenged Mr. Bradlaugh's right to take the Oath had he himself not raised the question in a public way. The question, however, having been raised, it was, he believed, his duty to challenge Mr. Bradlaugh as he did. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to draw an analogy between the case of the Quakers and the case of Mr. Bradlaugh; but there really was no analogy between those cases whatever. The Quakers were a law-abiding, God-fearing sect, who objected to the Oath on religious grounds, but were not incapacitated from taking it; while the Atheist, it was well-known, was legally debarred from taking an oath in a Court of Justice. From the first he was opposed to the appointment of the Committees, and his action had been justified by the fact that the lawyers on the first Committee, to whom they might have looked for guidance, voted on strict Party lines, with the exception of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who afterwards justified his claim to be elevated to the Judicial Bench by giving two opinions in different directions on the same case within a fortnight. He thought the Prime Minister had brought the whole embarrassment upon himself, and that the constitution of the second Committee, which was simply a reproduction of the first with a few names added, was not entirely satisfactory to the House. That Committee recommended that the House should collude with Mr. Bradlaugh to get out of the difficulty by referring it to the Courts of Law. But who was to go into a Court of Law? Nobody could be certain that there existed anyone who would bring an action. It was, therefore, a cowardly way of getting out of the difficulty, and the question was one which the House should decide for itself. As decisions of the Courts at Westminster were subject to appeal to the House of Lords, a reference of the question to the Courts of Law would result in this anomaly—that, as it was certain to be pursued to the bitter end, if taken up at all, it would go to the Highest Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords would have to decide upon the right of a Member of the House of Commons to take his seat or not. He had listened to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House with the admiration which he always felt for him; but he would confess that he could not make out what was the drift of his argument. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean by his speech that Mr. Bradlaugh was to be allowed to take the Oath or to make the Affirmation? As the House required some guidance from the right hon. Gentleman who had himself proposed the second Committee, and taken Mr. Bradlaugh entirely under his protection, they ought to know whether he was going to support the recommendations of Committee No. 1, or the recommendation of Committee No. 2 on the Oath, or the rider of the second Committee. He should not have troubled the House with any remarks had it not been for the not very amiable observations which had been addressed to himself by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster

(Mr. John Bright). Whatever happened, he hoped the Resolution would be upheld which he himself formerly proposed, and which had been affirmed by the Committee chosen by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in the few remarks I am about to make, I can assure you that I shall use no language calculated in the smallest degree to promote any feeling such as has been expressed on some occasions during the last two evenings, but that I shall adhere strictly to the terms of the Motion before the House. The Motion is simply that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm at this Table, and the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) proposes that Mr. Bradlaugh should not be permitted either to take the Oath or to make the Affirmation. The Amendment is said to be founded on the Reports of the two Select Committees which recently investigated this subject. At first it will, of course, appear to all hon. Members that, considering one of those Select Committees distinctly recommended that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm, it is difficult to found upon that recommendation the suggestion of the Amendment that he should not be allowed to Affirm. But we have the answer suggested by the other side that the Committee which made the recommendation that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm went beyond the Reference to them in making that recommendation, and that, therefore, it was not necessary for the House to follow them in that advice. Now, I wish to remind the House precisely of what the Committee did. The Chairman, my right hon. Friend the senior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), brought up a Report dealing almost exclusively with the question of the Oath. With regard to nearly the whole of that Report, I had the honour of voting with my right hon. Friend. There were some amendments suggested in the form of that Report; but those amendments practically did not touch its substance, and, as far the Committee were dealing with the recommendations of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and myself throughout supported those recommendations. But the last sentence of the draft Report of my right hon. Friend was in these words—

“Whether it will exercise its right and jurisdiction with reference to the claim now brought before it”

—which was the claim to swear at this Table—

“is a question which, as your Committee perceive, has not been referred to them, and they, therefore, confine the expression of their opinion to those parts of the case as to which their opinion has been asked by the House.”

What followed upon that? My right hon. Friend proposed emphatically to pronounce that the House had only asked the Committee to report what the House might do with reference to the Oath, but not to report what the House ought to do. Thereupon, three amendments were put before the Committee—one in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), another in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), and the third in the name of an hon. Member on this side. In the teeth of the advice that we should not include in our Report any recommendation as to the course the House should pursue, my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge was defeated by a majority of 11 to 10. An addition was then made to the Report by a considerable majority to the effect that the proper solution of the difficulty was to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to make an Affirmation. I wish to make it perfectly clear that we were forced into that position by the draft Report of the Chairman being defeated by Members mainly sitting on the other side of the House, whose rejection of the Chairman's advice forced us to make a definite recommendation to the House. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston says that Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be allowed either to take the Oath or to affirm, “having regard to the proceedings of the two Select Committees.” Now, the first Committee decided by 8 votes to 8, or, as two Members were absent, by 9 to 9, and, taking into account the casting vote of the Chairman, by 10 to 9, that a person in the position of Mr. Bradlaugh ought not to be permitted to affirm. But let me point out to the House that, of those nine Members, two were in favour of his being permitted to swear. What is the result of that? Out of the nine Members who reported that he should not be allowed to Affirm, only seven considered that he should not be allowed to swear, and the majority of 11 to 7 were of opinion that he should be permitted to take his seat, the sole difference among the 11 being whether he should be admitted after taking the Oath or after making an Affirmation. So far therefore, as the first Committee is concerned, the statement in the Amendment is entirely opposed to the facts of the case, because the large majority of the Committee were of opinion that he ought to take his seat, though they were not agreed as to the process by which he was to do so. In the second Committee, the question whether or not Mr. Bradlaugh should take the Oath was distinctly put; and when we heard it said to-day that my right hon. Friend the First Minister had not followed his own Attorney General, the late Solicitor General must allow me to remind him that he, on his part, did not follow his Attorney General. There were, therefore, five Members who would have allowed Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat after taking the Oath, and eight others who would have admitted him after an Affirmation. Therefore, in the second Committee the position was this—that 13 Members to 9 were in favour of his taking his seat, though they were not agreed as to whether he should Affirm or take an Oath. That is strictly the result of the proceedings of the Committee, both of which would have allowed him to take his seat, though they were not agreed as to the Oath or the Affirmation. This, I think, is a material point, and it would not look well for the House to record on its votes that, in consequence of the proceedings of two Committees, Mr. Bradlaugh was allowed neither to make an Affirmation nor to take the Oath. There is one other matter to which I should like to call attention. I wish to point out to the House that, if they will refer to the proceedings on the Jewish Oath Commission, they will find it assumed in those remarkable debates that when the words “on the true faith of a Christian” are omitted there is nothing to prevent a man of any faith, or of no faith at all, from entering the House. I am only referring to what is on record. I have looked very carefully through those debates, and will give the House instances which may have some little weight with them. One very eminent noble Lord said that the result of admitting Jews to Parliament would reduce the House to the level of a mere secular Assembly; and, again, in the House of Lords, Bishop Wilberforce said that the principle laid down by the Bill admitted to Parliament those who denied the existence of God. I cannot find that any Member of the House of Lords repudiated that sentiment. I come to Members of this House, and I find that the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) said that the result of the measure would be that we should be passing laws that had the sanction of no religion whatever. What could have been meant except that all persons who object to the Oath would clearly be able to take their seats? Does the junior hon. Member for Cambridge deny that such is the purport of the clauses in the Religious Oaths Amendment Act of the year 1857? He was very anxious, when we were emancipating the Jews, that some change should be made in the form of the Roman Catholic Oath, and he will remember that he voted in the small minority in favour of that change. He said at the time that unless that was done, it would be necessary to inscribe over the door of the House of Commons the legend upon the gates of Bandon—

“Jew, Turk, or Atheist
“May enter here, but ne’er a Papist.”

Therefore, it was well understood when that Bill passed that persons of every religion, or of no religion, would for the future be allowed to sit in this House; and I cannot find that to those who took that objection to the Bill there was one single word of reply that their fears were not well-founded. I listened with great interest, as I always do when he speaks, to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), who spoke with such eloquence to-night. When, in almost the beginning of his speech, he said “he felt compelled by all he had held dear in this world and the next to object to this proposal,” I was under the impression that throughout his speech he would remain on the same height of principle, and that the opposition which he directed against the Resolution would be maintained in the same spirit as he began. But what did the hon. Member say later on? He said—"You admitted Roman Catholics because they were numerous and pressing; you admitted the Jews because they were numerous and influential, and for years they pressed for admission; and when the Atheists are as numerous as the Jews, you will have to admit them."

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: What I said was, that then the House would have to consider their case.

MR. CHILDERS: We know what that means. We were to wait, then, to carry out this great matter of principle until the Atheists were as numerous as the Jews, and came knocking at our doors. I say, on the other hand, the way to prevent Atheists from making head in this country, the way to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh and his friends from becoming martyrs, the way to prevent that circulation of their works which the question of his entrance into this House within the last few days has produced, is to do justice. That is a principle which for the last 50 years has been well understood. If you want to put down Atheists, do not make Atheists martyrs. Let not Atheists be told by your vote to-night to increase and multiply; but let them in at once. I undertake to say that Mr. Bradlaugh's influence will not be a tithe of what it is when he sits inside the House, instead of, as at present, hovering round its portals.

MR. DALY said, he had no intention of taking part in the debate; but, as an Irish Roman Catholic, he could not remain silent after the concluding sentences of the last speaker. He was fully in accord with the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) when he said it was an insult to the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom, notwithstanding their struggles for years and their services to the country in every grade, to be compared with this isolated Atheist. As an Irishman and a Catholic he shrank from contact with Mr. Bradlaugh and his sort. He was one of those who, not belonging to the religion of the majority of that House, listened with reverence to the prayer offered up at the opening of their proceedings by a clergyman not of his own creed; and he asked would it not be a mockery, if persons like Mr. Bradlaugh should be admitted to the House—that, for the purpose of securing their seats, they should attend while that prayer was offered up? He had for years been accustomed to hold the sentiments of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster not only in respect, but in veneration; but when he heard the right hon. Gentleman state that there were men in that House who came to the Table and took the Oath as a pure formality, he confessed he could not share that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken concluded by asking the House not to make a martyr of Mr. Bradlaugh, and said that the disfranchisement of Mr. Bradlaugh would have a contrary effect from what was intended. He, however, was one of those who held that if the majority of the House decided as the right hon. Gentleman recommended, the unthinking portion of the people would conclude that they had endorsed the Atheism of Mr. Bradlaugh.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am unwilling, Sir, to stand in the way of any Members who might desire to address the House; but it may be well to consider the position in which we stand, now that we are about to go to a division. It is not, I think, to be wondered at, if hon. Members should wish to express their views, not merely on the technical points which have been raised, but also on collateral questions of very deep and grave interest; and it should hardly be matter of surprise, still less of rebuke, if Members, in the course of the discussion, should have travelled somewhat beyond the technical points of the question, and expressed their opinion on the religious, social, and political bearings of this great question. But when we come to the Vote, I think it is of importance that we should endeavour to clear our minds as well as we can; and I ask the House to consider for a moment the particular proposal on which they are about to pronounce an opinion. We are called upon by the hon. Member for Northampton to agree to a proposal, that Mr. Bradlaugh be admitted to make an Affirmation instead of taking the Oath required by law. Now, I wish, in the first place, to say, in regard to that Motion, it seems to me to be made at the wrong time, and a little too late. What has been the course which the House has followed in this matter? We have had several occasions on which such a Motion as the hon. Member now asks us to affirm might have been considered to come at a proper time. At the beginning of these transactions, the other Member for Northampton came to the Table and expressed a wish to Affirm. You, Sir, expressed a doubt as to the propriety of allowing him to do so, and a doubt as to the correctness of the claim he advanced. You referred the matter to the House. It would have been possible, and, I should say, in Order, if any Member of the House had come forward and made a Motion to the effect that the hon. Member should make an Affirmation; and if the views which the Prime Minister has propounded were sound, that would have been the correct and proper course to be taken, and on which the judgment of the House might have been asked. That course was not taken, because the Representatives of the Government, acting upon the instructions of its leading Members, who had not then taken their seats, proposed that, instead of deciding at once either that he could or could not affirm, the question should be referred to a Committee. A Committee was appointed, and with my own assent, and with the assent of many who sit on this side of the House, though with some demur on the part of others on account of the great haste with which the proceedings were commenced. That Committee was appointed for the express purpose of considering and examining the matter. The question was one of a legal character, as to the construction of certain statutes to which the hon. Member for Northampton appealed; and the Committee, by a narrow majority indeed, but still by a majority, after a very brief consultation, decided that it was not competent for Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm. When that Report was made, it was still within the power of this House to have expressed its dissent from the conclusion of the Committee; and it would have been perfectly competent for the sitting Member for Northampton, or the Government, or any Member of the House, to have given Notice that, instead of acquiescing in this Report, the House should proceed in conformity with the views of the minority of the Committee, and declare that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to affirm. But that course was not taken; and Mr. Bradlaugh, after hearing the conclusion which had been arrived at, instead of protesting against the decision of the Committee, instead of coming forward, through a friend or in person, and asking to be allowed to affirm, came forward and proposed to take the Oath as if nothing had happened. Sir, the sense of the House revolted against that proceeding, and, I think, rightly revolted. It was perfectly competent for the House—I said so at the time, and I think it would have been the right course for the House to take upon that occasion—to have declared that it was not right to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath as a mere matter of form. But, on that point, what was the course taken by the Government? Having desired that a Committee should be appointed, having awaited the decision of that Committee, having taken no step when that decision was laid before them, the object and the view which the right hon. Gentleman himself told us he had at the time when Mr. Bradlaugh presented himself was to allow the proceeding to go on—to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath and to say nothing while the mockery was taking place. That course would have been very unsatisfactory; but when it was rendered impossible by the action of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, who interposed to prevent, what I think the whole House or the majority of the House must have felt would have been something in the nature of a scandal, or, at all events, what would have been exceedingly painful to a very large number of persons in this House and elsewhere—when my hon. Friend interfered to prevent that taken place, what course was taken? No Amendment was moved that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm. But, first of all, a Question of Order was raised as to whether it was competent for anyone to interfere between a Member who wished to take the Oath. You, Sir, ruled that it was so. A Committee was then appointed to inquire into the case, and that, contrary to the views of some of us who sit upon this side of the House. That Committee entered into the question and decided that the course desired by Mr. Bradlaugh was one which he could not follow. That was a full answer to the question which had been referred to it. But the Committee went on and volunteered to advise what should be done, and their advice was that the opinion of the former Committee should be set aside. I want to point out that, all through these transactions, there has been apparently a desire to contrive in some way or other the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh to the House, and that the steps which have been taken to secure that admission have not been, up to this point, of a direct nature, declaring that he ought to be admitted, but that they have been steps in the nature of evasions of the difficulty placed before us. We have never had the courage to face that difficulty, and I do not think we have mended our position by the course which has been adopted. And now, Sir, at the last moment the sitting Member for Northampton comes forward with a Motion, which brings us back to the point at which we were at the beginning of the transaction, and that in a way which is, to my mind, very unsatisfactory and inconvenient. We cannot dissociate—although the hon. Member says nothing of it in his Resolution—his recommendation from the recommendation of the second Committee which considered the subject. While we only see on the face of the Motion a proposal that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to Affirm, we cannot avoid seeing that the hon. Member takes this step in connection with the recommendation of the second Committee, which is not a recommendation pure and simple that he should be allowed to affirm, but that he should be allowed to affirm in order that the responsibility and the difficulty we do not like ourselves to face may be shifted to another body—that is, to a Court of Law. Therefore, Sir, I say that the difficult point at which the hon. Member has arrived is rendered more difficult by his asking us to take a step, which he does not say will be a right and proper one, but rather one which will enable us to obtain the decision of a Court of Law. But I am bound to say that the position of the hon. Gentleman is still further weakened by what has taken place this evening. I think that the language and arguments of the Prime Minister, and the views which he has put forward, weaken still further the position of the hon. Gentleman, because the Prime Minister's argument was one rather against the conclusions of the second Committee than against that of the first, and pointed to this—that Mr. Bradlaugh ought to have been allowed to come up and take the Oath rather than that he should be allowed to Affirm. The case, I feel, is one which it is impossible for me to attempt to discuss with any advantage, after what we have heard in the course of the debate. Nothing I could say could be at all equal in authority to the argument of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin. My right hon. and learned Friend's argument extended over the whole case, and proved, I think, to the satisfaction of the great bulk of those who heard him, that the position which is now proposed be taken is one which is quite untenable. If we adopt the view of the Prime Minister, we are to sit by and consider the House a mere machine. We are to abdicate our functions and exercise no kind of jurisdiction in the matter of the taking of the Oath. I think it is impossible that we can accept that doctrine. It is impossible for us to agree to sit by merely that we should have the question decided by a Court of Law. My hon. and learned Friend the late Solicitor General pointed out how difficult it would be to get a fair and real decision by a Court of Law on the matter. I will not, however, enter into that question; but what I contend is, that we should be abdicating our functions and lowering the character of the House if we accepted the doctrine that when we have a matter of this sort before us, and have so far entertained it as to appoint two Committees to consider it, and have discussed it in two nights' debate, we are still to turn it over to the decision of a Court of Law. If it becomes to be believed in the country that we are not only doing this because it is a question of difficulty, but also because we are anxious to find some way—round the corner, as it were—for the purpose of introducing to this House a Gentleman whose opinions are such as have been so often described, the effect will be disastrous to our character; and when we are told that we ought to take this course in order to avoid the difficulties and dangers which might possibly await us, then I say, on the other hand, there is no sort of danger greater than for this House to show itself so cowardly as it would appear by the adoption of such a course of evasion. I do not believe there will be any danger of collision between this House and the Courts of Law. That is a bugbear which I feel we may set aside. But with regard to any possible collision with the constituency, I do not think we can avoid it by any course which we may adopt. I was struck by one of the observations in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark. I understood him to say, if you refer this matter to the Courts of Law, one of two things must happen—either the Courts will affirm that Mr. Bradlaugh is properly seated and has taken the Affirmation which he ought to have taken, or else the Court will decide that he is not properly seated, and, in that case, he will go back to his constituents. He may again be returned to this House; he may come to the Table for the purpose of taking the Oath, “and then,” said the hon. and learned Member, “I should like to see the legal authority who would stand in the way of his doing so.” The advice of the hon. and learned Member is, go to the Courts of Law; whether they decide that the statute means that he can Affirm or that he cannot the ultimate conclusion is certain—by one step or the other, Mr. Bradlaugh will obtain his seat in the House of Commons. And then, I think, he should have wound up with something like the conclusion of a problem in Euclid, and added, “which was to be done.” Now, Sir, I do not want to import into this debate any matter of acrimonious controversy; but I do express my opinion that the course which the House has taken has been on more than one point a doubtful course, and not such as I should have recommended. I regret that we have had two Committees, and believe that the second might have been dispensed with; but I think we owe it to ourselves not altogether to repudiate our own actions. As we have appointed these two Committees, let us, at all events, consider and judge of their recommendations. With regard to the opinion of the first Committee, I accept its decision partly on the ground of authority and because it is that which the Committee have agreed upon, and partly because it seems to me to be a decision founded upon a reasonable interpretation of the statutes. Looking at the intention with which these statutes were passed, it seems to me that the relief intended to be given was to apply to the case of persons who ought to give evidence before Courts of Law, who might desire to escape giving evidence, and who, in the opinion of the Judge, ought to be allowed or called on to affirm instead of taking an oath that would not be binding upon them, so that their evidence might not be lost. But, in the present case, no such considerations apply; while, on the other hand, the permission to Affirm is not claimed on the ground on which it is given to certain religious bodies. It is clearly not giving relief to conscientious scruples, because Mr. Bradlaugh has no such scruple about taking the Oath. The present is not like the case of a member of the Society of Friends or Moravians, who might, in a moment of weakness, have taken the Oath, and then would have felt he had committed a sin in doing so. There would be no relief in a case like the present, because, if the hon. Gentleman took the Oath, his conscience would be quite at ease. With regard to the second Committee, I look with respect upon its decision, so far as it relates to the particular point referred to it. But when it goes beyond that, and volunteers to make recommendations as to the course which we should pursue, I claim for myself and for this House the right to judge whether the course so recommended is one which is consistent with the position and duty of this House, and with the position which it holds in the eyes of the people. I say it is not; and I ask the House to join in rejecting the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton, upon the ground that it involves a departure from the position which this House is bound to take, and which, I believe, the country is expecting that we should take.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS was understood to support the Motion; but his speech was inaudible in the Gallery, owing to the confusion which prevailed in the House.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR.
BRADLAUGH).

MR. BRADLAUGH, one of the Members for Northampton, having come to the Table, claiming to take the Oath required by Law, the Clerk explained to him, that after the recent Resolution of the House, he was not authorised to tender him the Oath; and Mr. Bradlaugh having replied that he had no formal knowledge of the said Resolution, the Clerk reported the matter to the Speaker.

Sir Erskine May, addressing Mr. Speaker said: Mr. Bradlaugh claims the right to take the Oath.

MR. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. Member that the House at its last Sitting came to the following Resolution:—

"That, having regard to the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72."

In pursuance of that Resolution I must call upon the hon. Member to withdraw.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Before withdrawing, Sir, I would ask through you—[Cries of "Order!" "Withdraw!"] —before withdrawing, Sir, I would ask through you—[Renewed interruption.]
—before withdrawing, Sir, I would ask through you if this House, faithful to its old traditions, will hear me before putting that Resolution in force? There is no precedent for it.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. Member to desire to be heard upon the matter now under the consideration of the House. That is a question for the judgment of the House, and I must call upon the hon. Member to withdraw in order that the House may consider it.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I withdraw, Sir, while it is considered.

MR. BRADLAUGH withdrew.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to move that Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

MR. ASHTON DILKE: I will second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard."
—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: There is an ambiguity in the Motion which has just been made by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) which I think ought to be cleared up before we come to any decision upon the point. The ambiguity is this. In the Motion made by the hon. Member for Northampton he asks generally that Mr. Bradlaugh should be now heard. I think, Sir, that that Motion ought not to be put in that form. It ought to be put in the form that was adopted in the case of Mr. Daniel O'Connell, "That Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard at the Bar of the House."

Mr. SPEAKER: The Question is that Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard; and it is open to the House to declare its pleasure that he should be heard at the Bar.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I am quite willing to alter the Motion I have made, and to substitute for it a Motion, "That Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard at the Bar of the House."

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for Northampton ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Motion in order to substitute the words he has mentioned?

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Yes.

Question proposed, "That the Motion, by leave of the House, be withdrawn," agreed to.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I beg to move, "That Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard at the Bar of the House."

Question put.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I think, that before we proceed further, the Government ought to give us some advice.

Question again put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That Mr. Bradlaugh be now heard at the Bar of the House.

Mr. BRADLAUGH was then called in and came to the Bar of the House.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: Mr. Speaker: Sir, I have to ask the indulgence of every Member of this House, while, in a position unexampled in the history of this House, I try to give one or two reasons why the Resolution which you have read to me should not be enforced. If it were not unbecoming I should appeal to the traditions of the House against the House itself, and I should point out that in none of its Records, so far as my poor reading goes, is there any case in which this House has judged one of its Members in his absence, and taken away from that Member the Constitutional right which he undoubtedly has. There have been Members against whom absolute legal disqualification has been urged. No such legal disqualification is ventured to be urged by any Member of this House against myself. But even those Members have been heard in their places; those Members have been listened to before the decision was taken against them; and I ask that the House to myself shall not be less just than it has always been to every one of its Members. Do you tell me I am unfit to sit among you? The more reason, then, that this House should show that generosity which Judges show to a criminal, and allow every word he has to say to be heard. But I stand here, Sir, as no criminal. I stand here as the chosen of a constituency of this country, with my duty to that constituency to do. I stand here, Sir—if it will not be considered impertinent to put it so—with the most profound respect for this House, of which I had hoped and mean to form a part, and on whose traditions I should not wish to cast one shadow of reproach. I stand here returned duly, no Petition against my Return, no impeachment of that Return. I stand here returned duly, ready to fulfil every form that this House requires, ready to fulfil every form that the law permits this House to require, ready to do every duty that the law makes it incumbent on me to do. I will not, Sir, in this presence, argue whether this House has or has not the right to set its decision against the law; because I should imagine that even the rashest of those who speak against me would hardly be prepared to put it into the mouth of one whom they consider too advanced in politics an argument so dangerous as that might become. I speak, Sir, within the limits of the law, asking for no favour from this House for myself or for my constituency, but asking here for the merest justice, which has always been accorded to a Member of this House. I have to ask indulgence lest the memory of some hard words which have been spoken in my absence should seem to give to what I say a tone of defiance, which it is far from my wish should be there at all; and I am the more eased, because, although there were words spoken which I have always been taught that English gentlemen never said in the absence of an antagonist without notice to him in advance, yet there were also generous and brave

words said for one who is at present, I am afraid, a source of trouble and discomfort and hindrance to Business; and I measure those generous words against the others, and I will only make one appeal through you, Sir, and that is, that if the reports be correct, that the introduction of other names came with mine in the heat of passion and the warmth of debate, that then the Gentleman who used those words, if such there were, will remember that he was wanting in chivalry, because, while a man can answer for himself—and I am able to answer for myself—nothing can justify the introduction of any other name besides my own to make a prejudice against me. I fear lest the strength of this House — exercised, as I understand it to be, with infrequency of judicial exercise—that the strength of this House makes it forget our relative positions. At present, I am pleading at this Bar for justice. By right it is there, upon the benches of this House, that I should make my appeal. It is that right which I claim now in the name of those who sent me here. There was no legal disqualification before the Election, or it might have been made a ground of Petition. No legal disqualification since my Election is even pretended. It is said—"You might have taken the Oath, as other Members did." I could not help, when I read that, Sir, trying to put myself in the place of each Member who said it. I imagined a Member of some form of faith who found in the Oath words which seemed to him to clash with his faith, but still words which he thought he might utter, but which he would prefer that he should not utter if there were any other form which the law provided him; and I asked myself whether each of those Members would not then have taken the form most consistent with his honour and his conscience? If I have not misread, some hon. Members seem to think I have neither honour nor conscience. Is there not some proof to the contrary in the fact that I did not go through the form, believing that there was some other right open to me? Is that not some proof that I had some honour and conscience? And I ask those Gentlemen who are now about to measure themselves against the right of the constituencies of England, what justification have they for that measurement? Some say I have thrust my opinions upon this House. I appeal here, Sir, to the evidence of Sir Thomas Erskine May, and I can find no evidence of any opinion of mine having been thrust upon this House. I have read—it may be that the reports misrepresent—that the cry of "Atheist" has been raised on that (the Opposition) side of the House. No word of all mine before the Committee, no word of all mine in any document, puts these theological or anti-theological opinions in evidence before the House. I am no more ashamed of my own opinions—which I did not choose—I am no more ashamed of my opinions, into which I have grown, than any Member of this House is ashamed of his; and, much as I value the right to a seat in this House, much as I believe the justice of this House will accord it me before the struggle ceases, I would rather relinquish it for ever than it should be thought that, upon any shadow of hypocrisy, I had tried to gain a feigned entrance here by pretending to be what I am not. In the Report of the Committee, as it stands upon the evidence before the House, what is the objection either to my Affirmation or to my taking the Oath? It is said, "You have no legal right to affirm." I will suppose that it be so. It is the first time the House of Commons has made itself a Court of Law from which there may be no appeal, and deprived a citizen of his Constitutional right of appeal to a Court of Law to make out what the statute means in dealing with him. There is no case in which the House has overridden everything, and put one of its Members where he has no chance of battling for his right to take the Oath. It is possible that some of the lawyers—hon. and learned Gentlemen who have disagreed among themselves even upon that (the Opposition) side of the House—it is possible that they may be right, and that I may be wrong in the construction I have put upon the Oath. But no such objection can come. There is no precedent—there is, I submit respectfully, no right—on the part of this House to stand between me and that Oath which the law provides for me to take, which the statute, under a penalty compels that I shall take, and which another statute, under penalty even on Members of this House themselves if they put me out from my just Return, gives me a right of appeal. But what kind of conflict is provoked here if this Resolution be enforced? Not a grave conflict like that which takes place in a Court of Law, where the Judges exclude passion, and where they only deal with facts and evidence. I do not mean that these hon. Gentlemen do not deal with facts; but, if I am any judge, there have been many things which I can hardly reckon in the category of facts put against myself. I do not mean that they are not right, for hon. Members may know more of myself than I do myself; but, judging myself as I know myself, some of the hon. Members who have attacked me so glibly during the last few days must have been extremely misinformed, or must have exceedingly misapprehended matters. It has been said that I have paraded and flaunted some obnoxious opinions. I appeal to your justice, Sir, and to that of the Members of this House to say whether my manner has not been as respectful as that of man could be?—whether, in each case, I have not withdrawn when you told me? If I now insist on my right to come to that Table, it is because I feel that I should be a recreant and a coward to the constituency which has entrusted me to represent them; and I mean to be as Members have been in the best history of this Assembly. I ask the House, in dealing with my right, to remember how they are acting. It is perfectly true that by a majority they may decide now. What are you going to do then? Are you going to declare the seat vacant? First, I submit that you have not the right. The moment I am there, upon the floor of the House, I admit the right of the House, of its own will and pleasure, to expel me; but, until the time when I am there, I am as yet not under your jurisdiction. As yet I am under the protection of the law. A Return sends me to this House, and I ask you, Sir, as the guardian of the liberties of this House, to give effect to that Return. The law says you should, and that this House should; and, naturally so, because, if it were not so, a majority of Members might, at any time, exclude anyone they pleased. Now, what has been alleged against me? Politics? Are views on politics to be urged as a reason why a Member should not sit here? Pamphlets have been read—I will not say with accuracy, because I will not libel any of the hon. Members who read them—but, surely, if they are grounds of disqualification, they are grounds of indictment, to be proved against me in a proper fashion. There is no case in all the Records of this House in which you have ransacked what a man has written and said during his past life, and then challenged him with it here. My theology? It would be impertinent in me, after the utterances from men so widely disagreeing with me as have been made on the side of religious liberty during the past two nights—it would be impertinent in me to add one word save this. It is said that you may deal with me because I am isolated. I could not help hearing the ring of that word in the Lobby as I sat outside last night. But is that a reason, that, because I stand alone, that the House are to do against me what they would not do if I had 100,000 men at my back? [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] That is a bad argument—an argument which provokes a reply inconsistent with the dignity of this House, and which I should be sorry to give. I have not yet used—I hope no passion may tempt me into using—any words that would seem to savour of even a desire to enter into a conflict with this House. I have always taught and believed in the supremacy of Parliament, and it is not because for a moment the judgment of one Chamber of Parliament should be hostile to me, that I am going to deny the ideas I have always held; but I submit that one Chamber of Parliament, even its grandest Chamber, as I have always held and believe this to be, has no right to override the law. The law gives me the right to sign that Roll, to take and subscribe that Oath, and to take my seat there upon those benches. I admit that the moment I am in the House, without any reason but your own good will, you can send me away. That is your right; you have full control over your Members. But you cannot send me away until I have been heard in my place—not a suppliant, as I am now, but with the rightful audience that each Member has always had. There is one phase of my appeal which I am loth indeed to make. I presume you will declare the seat vacant. What do you send me back to Northampton to say to them? I have said before, and I trust I may say so again, that this Assembly is one in which any man might be proud to sit—prouder, I, that have not some of your traditions and am not of some of your families, but that I am of the people—the people who sent me here to speak for them. Do you mean that I am to go back to Northampton as a Court, to appeal to against you? Do you mean that I am to tell my constituency to array themselves against this House? I hope not; but if it is to be, it must be. If this House arrays itself against an isolated man—it is its huge powers against one citizen that you are thinking to use—if it must be that, then the battle must be, too. But it is not with the constituency of Northampton alone—hon. Members need be under no mistake—that you will come into conflict. If this appeal has to go forward—if the House of Commons is to override the statute law to get rid even of the vilest of its Members—had you alleged even more against me than against one man whose name was spoken of in this House last night, or had you endeavoured to allege as much against me, still I hold that this House cannot supersede the rights of the people of this country. But not as much is alleged against me as was alleged against that man, in whose case the House itself said that its conduct had been subversive of the rights of the people. I beg you, for your own sakes, do not put yourselves in that position. I have no desire to wrestle with you for justice. I have always believed that, although in moments of Party passion votes may be given which are sometimes repented of—I have always believed that in an Assembly of English Gentlemen having to deal with one, however obnoxious justice is meted out—and I admit I have used hard words in my short life that give men the right to say hard things of me—but is it not better that I should have the right, if within the law, to say them to your face? and, if without the law, then let the law deal with me fairly and properly, and not unfairly, as I submit you are doing now. You have the power to send me back; but, in appealing to Northampton, I must appeal to a tribunal higher than yours—not to the Courts of Law, for I hope the days of conflict between the Assembly which makes the law and the Tribunals which administer it are passed. It must be a bad day for England and for Great Britain if we are to be brought back again to a time when the Judges and those who make the law for the Judges are to try in rash strife what they mean. But there is a Court to which I shall appeal—the Court of public opinion. You say it is against me. Possibly; but then, if it be so, is it against me rightly or wrongly? I am ready to admit, if you please, for the sake of argument, that every opinion I hold is wrong and deserves punishment. Let the law punish it. If you say the law cannot, then you admit that you have no right, and I appeal to public opinion against the iniquity of a decision which overrides the law and denies me justice. I beg yours, Sir, and the House's pardon, too, if in this warmth there seems to be a lack of respect for its dignity, as I shall have, if your decision be against me, to come to that Table when your decision is given. I beg you, Gentlemen, to pause before a step is taken in which we may both lose our dignity. Mine is not much, but yours is that of the Commons of England. I beg you, before the gauntlet is fatally thrown down—I beg you, not in any sort of menace, not in any sort of boast; but I beg you, as one man against 600, to give me that justice which on the other side of this Hall the Judges would give me were I pleading before them.

Mr. BRADLAUGH then withdrew.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Northampton has presented himself at the Table to take the Oath, and, by the pleasure of the House, has been heard at the Bar. It is now for the House to declare whether the hon. Member should be called in to know the pleasure of the House. It is for the House to express its opinion upon that matter.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the Question which you have put to the House is, as I understand it, whether the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who has just been heard at the Bar, should be called in to know the pleasure of the House? I am not aware whether any hon. Member proposes to submit any Resolution to the House; but, if not, I hardly understand upon what point it would be necessary, or, indeed, possible, for the House to express any opinion. As I understand it, the House yesterday, after full debate, came to the conclusion that the hon. Member could not be allowed either to take the Oath or to make an Affirmation. Against that conclusion of the House the hon. Member has, in the speech to which we have just listened, advanced certain arguments. But they come after the House has arrived at a conclusion, and I am not aware that anything new has been advanced on the part of the hon. Member which had not been previously known to and considered by the House. Under these circumstances, it does not seem to me—but I speak in ignorance of what others may propose to do—that there is any occasion for us to come to any Resolution upon the matter, nor can I gather that there is any communication which it is necessary for the House to make to the hon. Gentleman. It seems to me that the matter is one which is left where it stood last night. We have had an intimation from the hon. Gentleman that he proposes, unless the decision of last night is in some shape or other rescinded, to take another opportunity of coming forward and challenging what he claims to be his right. If he should take that course, I presume that the House and you, Sir, will know what is the proper course to be adopted; but, in the meantime, so far as I can perceive, without directions from yourself, or in default of any Resolution which may be moved by others, it does not appear to me that it is necessary that we should take any further action in the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not reply, Sir, to the appeal made to me just now by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) because I was in doubt whether, the Question having been put, I could regularly speak. The fact was, I was in doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman had or had not spoken in due submission to the Forms of the House, or whether he had observed the stage which the Speaker had reached in putting the Question. I advisedly abstained from offering to the House any recommendation upon the Question, whether Mr. Bradlaugh should be heard or not? It does not appear to me that it appertains presumptively to me even to presume to take upon myself to give advice to the House in regard to any open question which may arise, or may be likely to arise, under the Resolution at which it arrived last night. I am one of the minority of this House who objected to that Resolution; all of us objected on the ground that we believed it to be impolitic, and some of us upon the ground that we believed it to be illegal. I am one of those who, leaning to the stronger of those propositions, felt that my belief, by even a leaning in that direction, disabled me from offering advice to the House in regard to particulars which may arise in any new or subordinate question connected with the application of that Resolution. For that reason it was that I abstained from offering my advice to the House. Now that Mr. Bradlaugh has had an opportunity of speaking, I may say that it would have been difficult to establish by strict argument the title of Mr. Bradlaugh, or of anyone, to offer observations at the Bar against the judgment of the House, a judgment at which the House has definitively and deliberately arrived. At the same time, I am free to say that I think the House, in hearing Mr. Bradlaugh, exercised a generous indulgence; and I do not doubt that, under the circumstances, it may have been a wise indulgence. Now, I have so far ventured to take upon myself to state exactly what my opinion was upon this question. The matter which has now arisen, as put Sir, by you from the Chair, is of a different character. I entirely agree with the Leader of the Opposition that no new question arises for the consideration of the House. If a new question had arisen, I might have thought it right to act as I acted before; but, at present, I think my duty is, in the first place, to sustain the Chair, whenever I have the opportunity, in the exercise of its authority with regard to this matter, to submit for myself to the Resolution of the House, and to use no indirect or circuitous means of frustrating or impeding the application of that Resolution. It was in acting upon this last expression of opinion that I stated my full concurrence with the Leader of the Opposition, when the right hon. Gentleman said that no new question had at present arisen which called for the judgment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The position in which the House is now placed is this. The hon. Member for Northampton has presented himself at the Table to take the Oath. I reminded the hon. Member of the Resolution which was passed yesterday, and, having read it, I directed the hon. Member to withdraw. The hon. Member desired, before acting upon my direction, that he might be heard. I submit to the House that the proper course is that the hon. Member should be desired to attend at the Table to receive a final direction from the Chair that he do withdraw—because the hon. Member, if I understand him aright, awaits the final verdict from the Chair after he has been heard at the Bar. Is it your pleasure that Mr. Bradlaugh be called in?

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to address the House. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that the House is now engaged in a formal proceeding—namely, simply to call in the hon. Member for Northampton in order that he may know the pleasure of the House. After the hon. Member for Northampton has been called in, and the pleasure of the House shall have been signified to him, an opportunity will be given to the hon. Member to address the House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That is precisely the point I wished to raise—what is the pleasure of the House upon this subject?—because I evidently could not raise that question after Mr. Bradlaugh had been called in and told what the pleasure of the House is. As I understand it, you intend to convey to Mr. Bradlaugh that the pleasure of the House is that he be neither allowed to affirm nor to take the Oath. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must correct the hon. Member. The Question I put to the House is, whether it is the pleasure of the House that Mr. Bradlaugh be called in?

MR. LABOUCHERE, who rose amid renewed cries of "Order," said: I apprehend, Sir, I am in Order. Of course you will tell me if I am not, and I will sit down; but I want to say this. You have, or the House has, heard Mr. Bradlaugh at the Bar. Well, it is just possible that the House may have changed its opinion—[Laughter—Hon. Gentlemen laugh; but let me ask if they started with the foregone conclusion that what was decided yesterday could not be altered, what was the use of calling Mr. Bradlaugh up to the Bar?

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY: I rise to Order. You, Sir, have informed the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) that the pleasure of the House is that Mr. Bradlaugh should now be called in. I ask you, after your having twice made that announcement, whether it is now in Order for the hon. Member to raise the question again?

MR. COURTNEY: I understand you, Sir, to put the Question to the House that Mr. Bradlaugh be now called in; and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Sir John R. Mowbray) is not correct in his supposition.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question I put to the House was—"Is it the pleasure of the House that Mr. Bradlaugh be called in?" If that received the general assent, no doubt Mr. Bradlaugh would be called in at once; but on putting that Question, the hon. Member for Northampton rises in his place, and claims to address the House on the point. Therefore I now call upon Mr. Labouchere.

MR. LABOUCHERE: As you have said, Sir, you asked the House whether it is the pleasure of the House that Mr. Bradlaugh be called in. Well, if Mr. Bradlaugh were called in, and it is the pleasure of the House that he be not allowed to affirm or to swear, would this be stated by you to him? It is that point I wish to challenge. I do not wish to make a long speech, for there have been too many speeches upon the question already. We have had speeches upon the Motion, speeches upon the Amendment, and upon other matters which had nothing to do either with the Motion or the Amendment. I do not think these speeches have changed many views. Hon. Gentlemen came down to vote one way or the other, and I think it was somewhat invidious to raise in an indirect manner the question whether Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to take the Oath of Allegiance. Up to the present moment no argument has been specifically addressed to this question. Upon this side of the House hon. Gentlemen spoke in favour of my Motion, that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to affirm. On that side of the House hon. Gentlemen spoke on the Amendment, and made many speeches to show that Mr. Bradlaugh might neither affirm nor take the Oath. But those speeches were not answered here. We have the fact before us that not only the Prime Minister is of opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh has an absolute and perfect right to come to that Table to take the Oath of Allegiance, without any interference on the part of the House; but we have also the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General (Sir John Holker), who sits on that side of the House, entertaining the same doctrine.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to call in question a vote of the House unless he is prepared to make a Motion to rescind it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, I will ask you, Sir, whether I may put this—

“That Mr. Bradlaugh, having been heard at the Bar of the House, be now allowed to take the Oath of Allegiance at the Table of the House?”

I gather that I may put that.

MR. SPEAKER: Such a proposition would be in direct opposition to the vote passed by the House yesterday, and cannot be put.

MR. LABOUCHERE: As I understand it, Sir, you ruled that I could ask the House to rescind the decision which it came to yesterday. That being so, I apprehend that I may move this Resolution. Of course if you say I may not, I may not, and there the matter collapses; but I understand that I may move the Resolution, and, under those circumstances, I am going to move the Resolution. Mr. Bradlaugh is in an exceedingly difficult position—

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I wish to ask, Sir, whether it is competent for the hon. Member to move to rescind a Resolution of this House without Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member for Northampton moves to rescind the Resolution passed by the House yesterday he will be in Order.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I will move to rescind the Resolution taken by the House yesterday. I have already said that I did not wish to occupy the time of the House by making a lengthy speech, either legal or otherwise, upon this question; but I will only point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite, as a matter of fairness to Mr. Bradlaugh, what his position is. Mr. Bradlaugh has been elected fairly and legally as the Member for Northampton, and it was his duty to that constituency to do his best to come into the House and to fulfil his duty as their Representative. He was anxious to affirm, because he was under the impression that that would be more pleasing to the House than that he should take the Oath; but when I brought forward the Resolution that he should be allowed to affirm, an Amendment was put and carried that he should neither be allowed to affirm nor to take the Oath. I beg to move to rescind the Resolution of yesterday.

MR. MACDONALD: I second the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), with great pleasure. I feel keenly upon the matter, because I look upon the course taken by the House as an attempt to trample on the rights of a constituency never before witnessed in connection with any constituency in the United Kingdom. If we are not successful in resisting that action, at least we who vote for the Motion will show that a large number of Members are still in favour of civil and religious liberty.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Mr. Bradlaugh, the Member for Northampton, having been heard at the Bar in support of his claim to take the Oath, the Resolution of the House relative to his claim be rescinded.”—(Mr Labouchere.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I rise to Order. I wish to put a question to you, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the important proposal which I understand to be made by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere.) I understand from the authority of the book to which we commonly look for guidance in these matters that in the case of a proposal to rescind a Resolution, the course pursued is that the Resolution itself should be read to the House, and then a Motion made to rescind it. That Motion, I understand, is now proposed by the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). I wish to ask if that is the right course to adopt on this occasion, or whether it is not necessary that Notice should be given of the intention to take so serious a step as to move to rescind a Resolution of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: On the question of Notice there is no doubt that, under ordinary circumstances, Notice is necessary; but this being a question of Privilege, and one affecting the seat of an hon. Member, Notice in such a case is not absolutely necessary, regard being had to the practice of the House. I will now put the Question.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. GORST: I rise to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order! The Question is that Mr. Bradlaugh, having been heard at the Bar in support of his claim to take the Oath, the Resolution of the House relative to his claim be rescinded.

MR. GORST: I move the adjournment of the debate. I do so for this reason. Whether the House requires Notice of this Motion or not, it is obvious that the rules of fair play require that a Resolution arrived at by the House in the small hours of the morning ought not to be rescinded at noon on the same day without some Notice being given. I feel sure that my Motion for the adjournment of the debate will receive the support of Her Majesty's Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Gorst.)

MR. NEWDEGATE urged that if ever a Motion for the adjournment of the debate was justified it was in this case. The House had given judgment in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh that day, and the House was asked within a few hours to rescind the Resolution which it had come to after two Committees had investigated the subject, and after the subject itself had been fully debated for two nights. Whatever might be the opinions of the sitting Member for Northampton, which had induced him to support his Colleague, he must say that his conduct now was scarcely respectful to the House. That was his opinion, at any rate. Mr. Bradlaugh had had the indulgence of the House as far as it could be granted.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not join in the censure which has just been passed upon the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). I have no doubt that he, like most of us, felt that whatever choice of difficulties we might make, choice of difficulties is the only course that we have before us. Nor was I in the smallest degree surprised by the judgment given by you, Mr. Speaker, from the Chair, that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the authoritative usage respecting Notice which is so vital, as a general rule, to the good order of our proceedings, could not be applied against the hon. Member.

Therefore, he will not misunderstand the words that I am about to speak. Viewing him as entitled to submit his Motion to the notice of this House upon his own conscientious judgment, I likewise have endeavoured to give it the best consideration I could at the present moment in the light that is thrown upon it by the consideration of the position of the several parties concerned in this important and critical affair; and, Sir, the judgment at which I have arrived is that no good can be done by persevering in that course. There cannot be the smallest hope that the House will rescind the Resolution of last night. If the House did rescind the Resolution, there is no doubt that it would be with a loss of dignity which I know not whether at some time or other, and under some circumstances or other, it might have to confront. What I look to is the probable issue of the re-affirmation of the Resolution, and at the position in which the mere proposal to rescind it places the House of Commons. I think it is inflicting disparagement upon the House, so far as that can be done by the act of the hon. Member, to make this request at the present time. I perfectly understand the obligation which might be felt by the hon. Member to run the risk of that disparagement if he had in view a practicable object of probable attainment. But he cannot himself so regard it. It practically assumes the character of a challenge to the House to affirm the Resolution at which it has already arrived. I can see no good that is to arise to Mr. Bradlaugh, to the House of Commons, to the constituency of Northampton, to the majority or to the minority of this House, from taking that course; and, therefore, not having shrunk myself from meeting the whole exigencies of this case, so far as I have been able to view and appreciate them, I would most earnestly appeal to the hon. Gentleman to waive this exercise of his right, and to refrain from pressing upon the House a Motion of the adoption of which there cannot be the smallest reasonable hope, and from the rejection of which nothing but inconvenience could arise.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Sir, after the appeal which which has been made to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who has already so nobly supported the cause of religious and civil liberty on this question, and who has stood up so bravely to defend the cause of the right of the constituencies to choose their own Member, without this House being converted into a Court of Appeal, I think that I should be wrong in persisting in this Resolution. Hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House will understand the peculiar position which I occupy. I have no wish unduly to obtrude myself upon the House in connection with this case. I have no wish to get the House into trouble; but I will point out that it was said by a far higher authority than I am—namely, by the Prime Minister yesterday, that if hon. Gentlemen did not agree to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to go at once to the Table and either affirm or take the Oath, then there was a good deal of trouble in store for them. I shall exceedingly regret it; but I trust hon. Gentlemen will see that it is not my fault. I beg leave to withdraw my Resolution.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that Mr. Bradlaugh be called in?

Agreed to.

And MR. SPEAKER having ascertained that it was the pleasure of the House that Mr. Bradlaugh should be called in, and Mr. Bradlaugh being at the Table,

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Bradlaugh, you attended the House this morning with a view to take the Oath. I then directed you to withdraw, and you expressed a desire that you should be heard before you were finally directed to withdraw. The House complied with that application, and you were heard by the House. Having been heard by the House, I have no further orders from the House beyond those which I have already signified. You will now withdraw.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg respectfully to insist upon my right as a duly elected Member for Northampton; and I ask you to have the Oath administered to me that I may take my seat. I respectfully refuse to withdraw.

MR. SPEAKER: I desire again to point out to the hon. Member that the orders of this House are that he do now withdraw.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. BRADLAUGH: With great respect, Sir, I refuse to obey the orders of the House, which are against the law.

MR. SPEAKER: I have now to appeal to the House to give authority to the Chair to compel the execution of its orders. I have no authority, in a case of this kind, without the orders of the House, to exercise force; and I must, therefore, appeal to the House to give me instructions for that purpose.

After a pause, during which there were loud cries of "Mr. Gladstone"—

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker, I feel that after what fell from the Prime Minister a little while ago that his position is one which is of great delicacy in this matter, and I entirely sympathize with and feel the force of his observations with regard to the course that ought to be taken in the details of the proceedings which are necessary in consequence of the decision at which the House arrived yesterday, contrary to his advice and to his opinion. Sir, I therefore take upon myself the responsibility, believing that I am thereby taking a course the most convenient to the House, and most in accordance with the feelings of the Prime Minister himself and of others, in making the Motion, which you say is necessary, in order to give you authority in the matter which you have now before you. I therefore will take upon myself to move—though I am not quite sure what the terms of the Motion should be—

"That Mr. Speaker do take the necessary steps for requiring and enforcing the withdrawal of the hon. Member for Northampton."

MR. SPEAKER: According to former precedents the Motion should be—"That the hon. Member do now withdraw."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Then I make that Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Bradlaugh do now withdraw."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

Mr. BRADLAUGH continued to stand at the Table while the division was being taken. The numbers having been announced—

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Bradlaugh, I have now to inform you that it is the order of the House that you do now withdraw.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I submit to you, Sir, that the order of the House is against the law, and I positively refuse to obey it.

MR. SPEAKER: Sergeant at Arms, remove Mr. Bradlaugh below the Bar.

The Sergeant at Arms, advancing to and touching Mr. BRADLAUGH upon the shoulder, requested him to withdraw.

MR. BRADLAUGH (while being removed below the Bar): I shall submit to the Sergeant at Arms removing me below the Bar; but I shall immediately return.

MR. BRADLAUGH, again advancing within the Bar, said: I understand that I am ordered out of the House. I claim my right as a Member of this House—[Cries of "Order, order!"]—I claim my right as a Member of this House to take the Oath and to take my seat. I admit the right of the House to imprison me; but I admit no right on the part of the House to exclude me, and I refuse to be excluded.

The Sergeant at Arms again conducted Mr. BRADLAUGH below the Bar.

MR. SPEAKER: The House has now to deal with a very grave matter. It is for the judgment of the House to say what course is now to be taken with Mr. Bradlaugh, the Member for Northampton, who, having been called upon to withdraw, refused to obey the order of the House. He was then ordered to be removed by the Sergeant at Arms, and now he again insists upon taking his seat in this House. I have to put it to the House to say what course should be taken with the hon. Member.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I apprehend, Sir, that the question now before the House is one altogether of a different character from that with which we have recently been occupied. It is not now a question of whether the hon. Member has or has not a right to take the Oath or make an Affirmation; but it is a question whether the authority of the Chair, and not only the authority of the Chair, but that of the House itself, is to be supported or disregarded. I am quite sure, Sir, that none of us are disposed to make any personal complaint of the conduct of the hon. Member. We know that he is in a position which calls for our consideration, and that we must make all proper allowance for the course which he may think it to be his duty to take. But we, too, have our duty to perform. Now, Sir, with reference to my own interposition at this moment, I must again apologize to this House for taking upon myself the function which would more properly belong to the Leader of the House; and I make no observations beyond referring to what I said a few minutes ago upon the circumstances which induced him to keep silence, and to leave the initiation of further proceedings to one who is in a less responsible position—namely, myself. Sir, I believe there is no question as to the course which it is my duty to recommend to the House. I make the Motion with regret, because I had hoped that Mr. Bradlaugh, having received authoritatively—and after having had a full opportunity of making his own statements in the House—through you, Sir, the decision of the House and the directions of the House, that he would withdraw; I had hoped that he would have attended to that instruction, and that he would not have put us in the painful position in which we stand of having to enforce the authority of the Chair. I do not know that there is an alternative open to us under these circumstances. It is quite impossible that we can allow the order of the House to be broken repeatedly, and the authority of the Speaker and the House itself to be challenged over and over again; and therefore I shall deem it my duty to move, not in any spirit of vindictiveness, but simply for the purpose of asserting the authority of the House and the Chair—

"That Mr. Bradlaugh, having disobeyed the Orders and resisted the authority of the House, be for his said offence taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bradlaugh, having disobeyed the Order, and resisted the authority of this House, be for his said offence taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant accordingly."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have endeavoured to act consistently upon the intention that I announced to the House. I thought it more seemly, and, upon the whole, more advisable that recommendations should be made to the House as to the steps for it to take in the process in which it is engaged, by those who have been parties to the original decision, rather than by one of those who had most objected to it and most lamented it. But at the same time, though it was no part of my duty, I think, to advise the House in the matter, yet the Mover of the Resolution and those interested in it have a fair right to expect that it should be viewed by me, and those immediately around me, with entire candour, and candour compels me to admit that I see no other course that could have been taken by those responsible for the decision of last night than the course which is described in the Motion just submitted to the House. I cannot myself think it right to attempt to resist the House ineffectually at each step in a consistent effort to give a perfect accomplishment and consummation to the Resolution at which it has arrived. I know not whether the decision will be disputed; but admitting that it follows logically and necessarily out of what has been already done, and moreover nothing could be more unsatisfactory to all parties, nothing more unseemly than the prolongation of the scenes such as we have lately witnessed, I can enter no objection to that Motion, considering it as being in reality involved in its essence in the previous proceedings of the House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not rise, Sir, to oppose the Resolution. I think it, however, a somewhat strange thing that a citizen of this country should be sent to prison for doing what eminent legal Gentlemen on this side, and an eminent legal Gentleman on that side of the House say he has a perfect right to do. ["No, no!"] Well, I do not know whether hon. Members opposite mean to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General is not an eminent legal authority on such a point. That is the view taken by that hon. and learned Gentleman. I say it is a somewhat hard thing that anyone should be put in prison for doing what a general consensus of legal opinion in this House holds to be his duty and his right. But, as the Prime Minister has stated, it is useless to oppose the Motion, because

Mr. Bradlaugh has come into conflict with a Resolution of the House, be that Resolution right or wrong. I, regretting as I do, the necessity that has been forced on the House, and regretting the Resolution that has been passed by the House, do not think I should be serving any good purpose in opposing the Resolution, or in asking the House to go to a vote on this question. I believe myself that the sending Mr. Bradlaugh into custody will be the first step towards his becoming a recognized Member of this House.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Mr. Speaker, I ask through you, Sir—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot be heard without the leave of the House.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I ask through you, Sir—["Order, order!"]

MR. COURTNEY desired to put a point which might deserve a little consideration. As he understood the Motion which had been proposed to them, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) was to be taken into custody for resisting an Order of the House. That, of course, they all expected would be fulfilled; but it occurred to him that if they could put a recital in that Order that the hon. Member disputed the legality of the action of the House in refusing to allow the Oath to be administered to him, it would then be competent for Mr. Bradlaugh, being in custody, to move for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, and on the return of that Writ, a question of the utmost importance—namely, the legality of that refusal—might possibly be raised. They were undoubtedly on the eve of a contention between the House and the Courts of Law, and there ought to be no backwardness on the part of the House in facing the consequences of its own action. He (Mr. Courtney) himself voted with the minority on the previous night; but he was of opinion that the Resolution then carried, though impolitic, was legal; but as the hon. Member's contention was that that Resolution was illegal, he thought there should be, as he had suggested, the possibility of inserting a recital to the effect that the hon. Member for Northampton disputed the legality of the action of the House in refusing to allow the Oath to be administered to him.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN pointed out that the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Courtney's) suggestion raised an issue which was not now before the House. Mr. Bradlaugh was about to be committed, not for his refusal to take the Oath, but for his refusal to withdraw when ordered to do so by the House; and nobody could say there was any precedent for putting on the books of the House a recital in connection with an Order for withdrawal. It occurred to him (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) that if the question as to taking the Oath were to be raised in any way that would enable the House as well as Mr. Bradlaugh to try it, Mr. Bradlaugh himself could raise the question by walking into the Lobby and giving a vote or by taking his seat in the House; but any Member of the House who refused to obey an Order of the House thus conveyed to him by the Speaker would be in exactly the same position which the Member for Northampton now occupied. He understood that the committal was for disobedience to the Order of the House, and for nothing else.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he thought it was important that they should have on the record all the circumstances connected with the giving of Mr. Bradlaugh into custody, for it would be in the power of the House, by making a mere general Return that he was given into custody for disobeying the Order of the House, to evade all consequences of law whatever, as a Court of Law would not go behind the Return. But he took it that the majority would not shrink from the responsibility of their action. Having stepped between Mr. Bradlaugh and the discharge of what he considered to be his Parliamentary duty, they ought not to be afraid to have clearly on record what were the circumstances in connection with the giving of Mr. Bradlaugh into custody, in order that he might have an opportunity of asking the Courts of Law whether the action of the House was or was not an illegal obstruction. A proper Resolution to this effect could not be drawn up on the spur of the moment; but it was clear that those who felt strongly that the House was entering on an illegal course of action, in defiance of the warning of one of its oldest Members—

MR. FINIGAN: Sir, I rise to Order. I wish to know whether a gentleman who is taking notes at the Bar is doing so with the cognizance of the House?

MR. SPEAKER made no reply.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY resumed, and said that he and others wanted to have all the circumstances placed on the records of the House, so that the legal question might hereafter be properly raised. He did not think that ought to be decided on the spur of the moment, and he suggested that there should be an adjournment in order to give time for the consideration of the matter.

MR. MACDONALD: I rise again, Sir, to call your attention to a gentleman who is now, and has been for some time, within the limits of this House taking notes, and I wish to know whether that is by your authority or the authority of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: The shorthand writer referred to by the hon. Member is present by the authority of the House, and he is taking down—not the debates of the House, for that would be clearly out of Order—but simply the proceedings with reference to this matter, which is a matter of Privilege.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he would move the adjournment of the debate, as it was impossible at that moment to settle a Resolution in a form that would raise the whole matter.

MR. MACDONALD seconded the Motion. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) was entitled to have a clear record of the proceedings if he intended, as he (Mr. Macdonald) hoped he did intend, to appeal at once to a Court of Law to vindicate his right to sit in the House. The hon. Member appeared there, largely supported by the working men of Northampton; and as representing the working men of the town of Stafford he (Mr. Macdonald) claimed that the hon. Member might have every justice done him, and that he might have the proceedings clearly recorded. Hon. Members on the Opposition side had had the courage, on the previous night, to go into the Lobby to deprive Mr. Bradlaugh of his right, and to deprive the town of Northampton of its right to return him; and if they did not have the courage to allow the whole matter to be placed on the records of the House, he (Mr. Macdonald) said that they would be acting in a spirit of cowardice unworthy of a great Assembly. [Cries of "Order!"] He was under the order of the Speaker, and not under the order of the Opposition. Till he had his condemnation, his language would be "No." He said again that they would be acting in a spirit of cowardice. The meanest subject in the Realm had the power to appeal to a Court of Justice; but by the course proposed the hon. Member for Northampton would be deprived of that right. He (Mr. Macdonald) therefore cordially seconded the Motion for adjournment, so that the whole matter might be put in such a form as would give the hon. Member an opportunity of bringing his case before the Courts of Law.

(Mr. Lyulph Stanley.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his reasons for abstaining from taking part in the discussion were similar to those of the Prime Minister; but it might be expected that he should say a few words with respect to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). He understood that suggestion to relate to the probability of the action of the House being reviewed by means of legal proceedings, and the phrase used by the hon. Member was that the House was on the verge of coming into collision with the Courts of Law. He apprehended that there was, in fact, no such probability. He understood the case to be this—that Mr. Bradlaugh, having received directions from the Speaker, with the full acquiescence of the House, to withdraw from the House, had thought it right, in order to maintain the claim which he had made, to refuse to withdraw. He (the Attorney General) apprehended that that was clearly an act of disorder and contempt. He supposed Mr. Bradlaugh had so done for the purpose of maintaining what he considered to be his right; but clearly it was a contempt of the House not to obey the order to withdraw. He would not enter into a legal question; but he apprehended that there were decisions over and over again, well known to them all, that a Court of Law had no power to review such proceedings of the House. The House had that inherent power which every Court had, to maintain order within its walls, and to prevent its orders from being treated with contempt. There could, therefore, be no power of reviewing the proceedings of the House. He understood his hon. Friend who had made the suggestion to wish it to be shown on the Warrant that Mr. Bradlaugh had acted in the exercise of a bond fide claim of right to remain in the House. He was sure that the House would be unwilling to take any course that would prevent the hon. Member for Northampton from raising any legal right which he thought he might possess, and that, considering all the circumstances of the case, the House would be very careful to see that the hon. Member should be in no way prejudiced by a refusal to bring all the facts of the case before the Court that was said to have power in the matter. But there could be no possibility of any injustice being done to the hon. Member by refraining from setting out in the Warrant the reasons for the Order, for, supposing there was a right in the Courts of Law to review the decisions of the House, against which view he protested, he presumed it would be done by moving for a Writ of habeas corpus, and that application would have to be made on affidavits, stating distinctly the whole of the proceedings. He thought, therefore, that it would be contrary both to the practice and the dignity of the House to enter on the warrant of commitment the course taken by Mr. Bradlaugh, but only the order made by the House, and he could assure the House that in doing so they would not be prejudicing any claim made by the hon. Member.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY asked leave to withdraw his Motion for an adjournment, because he understood, from indications on the other side of the House, that if the matter came before a Court of Law the facts would be stated as fully and fairly as possible.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, Mr. Bradlaugh wished him to state that on coming to the Table and on being asked to withdraw, he said—"I positively refuse to obey the order of the House, as not being according to law." All that Mr. Bradlaugh asked was that those words should be on the face of the proceedings. He (Mr. Labouchere) hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would not object to that. They might be useless; but in that case they would only be surplusage, and could do no harm. There could be no doubt that Mr. Bradlaugh did say those words.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed.

Mr. FINIGAN said, that as an Irish Member, sent to that House for the purpose of obtaining guarantees for the liberties and freedom of Ireland, he could not see that he should be supporting the principles of liberty by in any way consenting to the imprisonment of a Gentleman over whom, he contended, the House had no jurisdiction. Until Mr. Bradlaugh had taken his seat within that House as a Member, he was convinced that, if not from a legal point of view, yet from the point of view of justice, the House would be acting in an impolitic and unjust manner if it condemned to imprisonment a Gentleman over whom it had no control. He had heard many arguments in that House for and against Mr. Bradlaugh; but he had not heard from any of the legal or non-legal speakers a tittle of evidence to prove that Mr. Bradlaugh had no right to take an Oath in that House. Therefore, until the House had had time to calmly consider the question, and in order that some judicial opinion might be taken on the case in the interests of justice, as a supporter of the liberties of his own country, and an opponent of any form of tyranny whatever, he moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Finigan.)

Mr. NEWDEGATE pointed out to the hon. Member that, while he enjoyed the privileges of a Member of the House, it was contrary to the authority of the House, and to the authority of any Legislative Assembly, however democratic it might be, to interrupt the exercise of its authority, not only over a Member, but over any other person who interrupted its proceedings.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 342; Majority 337.—(Div. List, No. 28.)

Original Question proposed.

Mr. PARNELL said, he had not taken any part in the debate on this question up to the present moment, because he had found that his opinions upon it were not shared by the great majority of the Irish Members. Although he had felt it right to vote in the division of the previous day, and in the various divisions that had taken place that day, he had not up to that point deemed it right to obtrude himself upon the House. But they had now reached a stage at which he felt it was his duty to say a few words in explanation of the vote he had given. The Resolution which the Speaker had put from the Chair asked the House to decide that Mr. Bradlaugh be committed to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms—in other words, that he be imprisoned. He asked hon. Members to consider the position in which they would be placed if the House adopted the Motion. They had not decided that Mr. Bradlaugh's seat be declared vacant, and if they imprisoned him, they put themselves in this position—that either they would have to leave the question alone with reference to the vacation of the seat for Northampton, or else they would have to adjudicate upon it during the imprisonment of the principal person concerned. If they did not proceed to vacate the seat they inflicted a grievous injury upon the constituency of Northampton by depriving it of the opportunity of being represented in that House. If, on the other hand, they proceeded to consider the question of vacating the seat, they would have to do so during the imprisonment of Mr. Bradlaugh, whose case they would have to decide behind his back and without affording him an opportunity of saying anything in his own defence. But his (Mr. Parnell's) object in rising, more particularly at that time, was to point out to his hon. Friends from Ireland that if they voted for the Motion before the House, they would vote, as he believed, for a Motion repugnant to the feelings of the people of the Southern, Western, and Eastern divisions of Ireland. He could not believe that the Irish constituencies would desire their Members to vote for the imprisonment of anybody. They knew the last time that Motion was made it was made against the late Mr. William Smith O'Brien, who was taken to the place to which he supposed the hon. Member for Northampton would be taken. He could not help thinking that there were alternatives to the course which it was proposed to adopt—such, for example, as excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from the House—and that there was no reason to imprison the hon. Member and do an injury to the constituency. He would conclude as he had begun, by saying that he did not believe the Irish constituencies would wish even an Atheist to be imprisoned.

MR. A. MOORE said, he protested against the false issues which had been raised. They did not imprison this man because of his religious opinions. An Order had been given to him to withdraw, and he had refused to obey that Order. Such a proceeding was clearly a breach of the Privileges of the House, which would be only exercising its legitimate authority by acting upon the Motion now before it. He denied that the issue raised by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was the true or real issue before the House.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he was sorry to be obliged to differ from his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) on the course he had taken in this question. On most subjects he was quite ready to allow his hon. Friend to speak for him; but on this occasion he must positively decline to do so.

MR. PARNELL said, he rose to explain. ["Order, Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) was in possession of the House; but he understood the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) to rise merely to make an explanation.

MR. PARNELL said, that he wished, with the permission of his hon. Friend (The O'Donoghue), to explain that he had not attempted to speak for any hon. Member but himself.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, that of course he did not for a moment wish to deny his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) an opportunity to explain; but he certainly understood him to say that the course which many Irish Members had taken, or were about to take, would be disagreeable to their constituents in the South and West of Ireland. He (The O'Donoghue) entertained no doubt whatever that the course which he had taken and intended to take would be in accordance with the wishes and feelings not only of his constituents but of the great majority of the people of the South and West of Ireland. The facts of the case had not been put before the House quite fairly. Mr. Bradlaugh was ordered to withdraw, and in defiance of the Rules of the House he declined to do so. He (The O'Donoghue) thought he was doing his duty to the House and to his constituents in voting that every necessary step should be taken to compel Mr. Bradlaugh to conform to the Rules of the House.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 274; Noes 7: Majority 267.—(Div. List, No. 29.)

Ordered, That Mr. Bradlaugh, having disobeyed the Order, and resisted the authority of this House, be for his said offence taken into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant accordingly.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL INQUIRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Fay, Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Dr. Cameron, Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

[BILL 132.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FAY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was designed to provide for the establishment of a tribunal for the conduct of local inquiries relating to Private Bills in Ireland. He did not claim to be the author of the Bill. It was drawn by his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. P. J. Smyth), but handed over to him (Mr. Fay) when his hon. Friend was unable to come to the House in time for the presentation of the Bill. It was highly probable that the idea of introducing the measure had its origin in his hon. Friend's mind, probably to a great extent, in words spoken by the right. hon. Gentleman now at the head of Her Majesty's Government, when he was appealing to the sympathetic heart of Mid Lothian. Of course, no one should be tied to the ipsissima verba of an electioneering speech no more than the more social Members of that House should be tied to their after-dinner speeches; but still the expression of the Prime Minister's feeling on the subject-matter of the Bill strongly advised some local machinery for relieving the House of Commons such as the Bill recommended. Now, neither he nor his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary meant at all to come forward, and, in answer to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, cry out "Eureka." On the contrary, they humbly submitted to the House what they considered a fair suggestion. The question was no now one. It had been mooted in that House more than once; and on all occasions the concession had been made by the House that there existed a necessity for some reform in this direction. As to carrying out the desired measures, their proposal did not in any way invade the ancient Prerogatives of Parliament. It was no new scheme, repealing Acts of the House deliberately passed, or establishing, as against old precedents and old tribunals, new laws and new organizations. The Bill merely proposed that, to provide facilities for legislation on Private Bills in Ireland, they should change the venue of the existing tribunals in that and the other House, as regarded certain component parts thereof, from London to Ireland. They should establish a branch of the Private Bill Office in Dublin, to be called the "Irish Private Bill Branch Office," for the deposit of Irish Private Bills, subject to regulations by Standing Orders, to be made from time to time for that purpose by each House of Parliament; that Private Bills originating in the House of Lords should be referred to a Committee consisting exclusively of Irish Representative Peers, or Peers of Parliament connected with Ireland by having a residence in that country; that Private Bills originating in the House of Commons should be referred to a Committee composed exclusively of Irish Members of Parliament, and that these Committees should hold their sittings in Ireland, at such convenient places as they might select. As the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had, to a great extent, practically conceded the merits of the claim which he now advanced, it was not his intention to go into details upon the question, and he should be as brief as possible in his remarks. But there were three points which occurred to the Irish mind in regard to Private Bills. He alluded to Railway, Gas, and Tramway Bills, and all Bills of that class. Now, the points which had provoked a very strong expression of feeling in Ireland in respect of these measures were (1)

the serious inconvenience attending the promotion of such schemes in London; (2) the large drain of money from Ireland into London; and (3) that the great expense attending the promotion of smaller schemes, such, for instance, as small trams, had operated to prevent a great many valuable improvements from being effected in the country. These were all very serious grievances. As to the inconvenience, that was probably the smallest matter; but he would say much valuable evidence was lost by the fact that many men of position and great business engagements fought very shy of being kept knocking about the Lobbies of the House for weeks, perhaps, awaiting to be called as witnesses. But as to the drain from the country, first, from a general point of view, he found that it was calculated, when this matter was under discussion in 1871, that, from 1800 to 1870, 681 Irish Local Acts were passed. That did not include the rejected private measures. Well, take them at another 681, he would calculate the loss in cash to Ireland for legal and other incidental costs at nearly £3,000,000. Add to this travelling and hotel expenses of witnesses, and those interested in the Bills, and the sum would probably represent close on £6,000,000 lost to Ireland. That, in itself, to a poor country, was a severe loss. As regarded the witnesses' expenditure, he might add that it was wonderful how men accustomed to humble homes and meagre fare dropped at once into views about grand hotels and choice brands of wine when they came over as such witnesses. Enthusiastic Englishmen ascribed this fact to the instantaneous refining feeling of London society; others, more prosaic, believed it ascribable to the fact that every witness thought corporations and projectors of companies fair game for plunder. But the expense of promoting Bills by small townships had been something enormous; and he could heap up instances of the evil. He should take as a present illustration one of the last made townships in Ireland—that was Drumcondra. Its rating was £13,000 only; its conversion into a township cost £1,700 under the present system. There were other township creation expenses equally bad, including Rathmines, Sligo, £14,000; Clonmel, £20,000; and he might also refer to the cost of the Dublin

Trunk Railway, amounting to £54,000. He could multiply incident after incident if he so desired; but he should now point out that the result of this was that a great many small improvements in Ireland were prevented from being carried out. By way of illustration he might mention that in many parts of Ireland small links were wanted to connect them with existing railways. These gaps could not well be filled up by the making of railroads. In point of fact, they would not pay; but if they could get Tram Bills at a very cheap price—say for a few thousand pounds—they could in many cases connect towns which were now almost inaccessible. These trams would be extremely suitable, especially in the mountainous districts, where the circumstances of the country would not afford a short railway to meet the nearest stations or mountain roads. Well, in these cases the companies promoting schemes would, under the present system, be out of pocket half the amount of money that would be required to form the line before they were in a position to lay a rail; for it would have to be spent in London on high fees to London lawyers, and luxurious living. That was a very serious defect. As regarded the reclamation of waste lands the very same thing would happen. He (Mr. Fay) himself was about projecting a company for the reclamation of certain slob-land. It would, he believed, have been a great commercial success; but everyone seemed anxious to avoid an immediate investment of ready money for expenditure in London. Send them back to Ireland, where their legal expenses would be about one-tenth of what they were here, and their witnesses and other expenses infinitesimal. From the point of knowledge of the facts, surely the Irish Peers and Commons were the best judges of Irish wants and Irish witnesses. For his part, when, six years ago, he came first to that House a very glutton for work, he found himself appointed a Member of a Committee on a mixed group of Welsh, English, and Scotch Bills. His first look at the Paper finished him, and he had never served on a Committee since. The Bill that headed the list was a railway from some place in Wales to some other place in the same Principality. The two names were composed of the letters C F B and W thrown together, apparently without any regard to pronunciation. He had never heard of them before or since, for he had a fixed idea that the Bill was a sort of conundrum intelligible only to Welsh people. The next Bills were either Scotch or English, relating to water-works, and a turnpike in places he had never heard of. He asked himself could he conscientiously do his duty in respect of a Bill about which he knew nothing and cared less; and he considered it his duty to plead professional engagements and leave room, perchance, for some Welsh Gentleman, who might solve the puzzle of the Welsh names, or for some Scotch or Englishman who took an interest in the water supply or turnpikes affected by these Bills. He maintained that with a system such as he advocated the expenses would be so materially reduced that they would be able to undertake measures for the improvement of land and for giving greater facilities for locomotion to people throughout the country. Well, now, what could be the objection to trust Irish Peers and Members with these local inquiries? Had the Irish Peers shown themselves open to corruption, or had the Irish Members, of no matter what politics, a single shadow been thrown on their honour as Committeemen of this House, and they had acted as such ever since the Union? Surely, if such was the case, they might be trusted in their own country to do their own work. Look to the whole controlling parties of Ireland—Judges, Superior and County Courts, magistrates, corporations, Poor Law Boards—where was there a spot upon their reputation? But they might say—What about the Provisional Order system of the Local Government Board? The answer was—The Irish people would have none of it; they would not have a few unsympathetic paid clerks, unacquainted with the people and their wants, deciding on the wishes of the elective bodies, whether corporate, company, or otherwise. They had never worked in harmony with the people, and their dealings with local bodies had been very unsatisfactory. It would be a misfortune if a practical measure like the present were not accepted by the Government, or, at any rate, so far favoured as that they would be disposed to institute an inquiry into the necessity of establishing such a system as he proposed. He would, indeed, be sorry to impede in any way Her Majesty's Government in the discharge of those duties which this short Session rendered urgent. Should Her Majesty's Ministers see their way to the appointment of a Committee on the subject, or the more extended one indicated by the speech of the Prime Minister at Mid Lothian, he would be perfectly satisfied. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fay.)

DR. CAMERON said, he had had no intention of interposing in the debate at so early a period, although his name was on the back of the Bill, and he only did so because no one else had risen. He regretted that the Treasury and the front Opposition Benches were both alike conspicuous by their emptiness, for this was a Bill of great importance; and what he wished to insist upon was the necessity of some legislation of this kind, not only for Ireland, but for Scotland and England. They felt in Scotland quite as much as was the case in Ireland the need of some local tribunal to dispose of their Local Bills. As to the details of the measure, he would not enlarge upon them, or discuss whether they ought to remedy the evil by perambulating Committees of this House, or a system of legislation by Provisional Order; but he contended that if they were to set to work to devise the very worst possible system of Private Bill legislation, they could hardly by any possibility devise a worse than the system which at present prevailed in Parliament. His own experience in connection with the city he represented had been as unfortunate as had been the case of Dublin in the instances referred to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Fay). Glasgow was continually in the Committee-rooms upstairs, and was always spending large sums of the money of the ratepayers in expenses, either when obliged to come there for needed improvements, or when dragged there by its neighbours. What sort of tribunal did they find? Those cases in which the city was interested, involving enormous sums of money and enormous interests, might be disposed of before a tribunal consisting of a majority of Members who had never sat upon a Private Bill Committee before. He (Dr. Cameron) himself had sat upon one group of Private Bills on a Committee on which three Members were new Members who knew nothing whatever of the proceedings of the House of Commons, and knew nothing of the traditions or the Rules which regulate them. So long as they had learned Gentlemen of the long robe to guide them, they did not go very far wrong; but when the opposition to a Bill was withdrawn they found themselves in a mess in settling the clauses. One clause after another came up, and the whole discussion then turned on whether these clauses were approved of by Mr. Speaker's counsel or by Lord Redesdale's counsel. Were those Gentlemen, however able or however eminent, to be the tribunal to settle clauses materially affecting the interests and liberty of the lieges in this country, and was it the function of a Committee simply to endorse their views? No worse tribunal could, in fact, be devised than that which now existed. They had no need to go further than that day for an example. There were a number of Committees upstairs; but in consequence of the interesting scene being transacted in this House about Mr. Bradlaugh, the Members of those Committees left the Committee-rooms, and the persons who had the Private Bills there were obliged to keep over for another day their witnesses, to refresh their counsel, and to have the whole of their business retarded. If they had perambulating Committees, going about the country and instituting inquiries, they would, of course, report to this House, and then legislation would proceed on precisely the same lines as it did at the present moment. He did not say that would be the best possible solution of this question; but it was a very simple solution. It did not deprive the House of its jurisdiction. It simply left the Committee to take evidence in Ireland, instead of in a Committee-room of this House. An eminent authority, the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson), while Chairman of Ways and Means proposed another system—that evidence should be taken by a perambulating Commission, or other tribunal, and that upon that evidence legislation should proceed by way of Provisional Order. That system was not open to the objection of local legislation originating in Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board, which he objected to quite as strongly as anyone. He thought a rawn; otherwise I shall feel it my duty to move the Previous Question, and, as a matter of form, I must take that step now, in the possibility of the hon. Member not complying.

Motion made, and Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT saw no reason why Irish professional men should not have the advantage of conducting these inquiries in their own country. At the same time, he thought Irish Members should be content with the assurance given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and withdraw the Bill. He was satisfied that whatever the right hon. Gentleman said he meant.

MR. M'LAREN said, he took an interest in this Bill, because the same principle as was contained in it was applicable to Scotland. There was in it a demand that had been made there for many years. The evil was felt very strongly indeed in the North, and a desire for some such arrangement was most universal amongst those who had to do with private legislation. He did not, however, agree with the clauses of the Bill, as he thought it would be easy to establish a better plan.

An hon. MEMBER wished to suggest to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that, as he had expressed his approval of the principle of the Preamble, he would, probably, when they came to deal with the measure, as promised by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, find it useful to look into the provisions of two Bills which were brought in on this subject in 1872 by Mr. Pim and others, because he thought that, to a certain extent, the first part of the Bill was defective. By looking at the Bills to which he referred, any valuable suggestions might be received by the right hon. and learned gentleman.

MR. FAY, out of deference to the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, asked leave to withdraw the bill. He was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the cordial answer he had given.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MIDDLESEX LAND REGISTRY BILL

(Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Gregory, Sir Thomas Chambers.)

[BILL 142.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOPWOOD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said that it originated in the wants of a large number of building societies, who were much interested in the proper registration of land titles, and the object of which was to make a registry which had existed for more than 100 years, and was confessedly in a most complicated and useless state, a working registry assuring people interested in the purchase and conveyance of land something like certainty of title by establishing a system of registration similar to what prevailed in Scotland. The Bill was practically that which the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) introduced last Session, and he trusted it would meet with favourable consideration at the hands of the Government. The Bill commenced by repealing the statute of Queen Anne relating to the registration of land, and proposed to bring the matter under the direction of the Lord Chancellor as far as the regulation of the system was concerned. He further proposed that all the necessary local description of the property should be registered, and that its operation should extend not merely to the county of Middlesex, its original limit, but to the Metropolis generally, as defined by the Metropolis Local Management Act. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that at the commencement of last Session, as Chairman of the Committee which had sat to consider this question, he introduced a tentative measure, founded on the Scotch system. The Bill, before the House was practically the same measure; and speaking, as he did on behalf of the Government, he found himself in the awkward position of having to oppose its second reading. In the language of the late Prime Minister, "a good deal had happened" since the time of which he had spoken, and the Gov-

ment had promised to lay before Parliament measures dealing with the whole question of land transfer, of which this question of registration formed a part. Under those circumstances, it could hardly be expected that at this stage of the Session they would be prepared to enter into a piece-meal discussion of this particular measure. He trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with his promise that the Government would give the subject their best attention, and would not press his measure.

MR. GREGORY, approving of the principle of the Bill, expressed his regret that the Government were not prepared to accept it at once; but trusted they would deal with the question at as early a period as possible.

SIR HENRY JACKSON hoped there would be time before the House adjourned to move a direct negative to a Bill which, although an apparently innocent, was really a most objectionable measure. It was an amiable attempt to patch up a system which every lawyer knew by experience to be very costly, and, if not mischievous, at best useless in its effect, and instead of amending it would, by continuing the system of registration of assurances, tend to keep back the reform of land transfer, which, in his judgment, depended entirely on registration of title. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Henry Jackson.)

MR. HOPWOOD signified his willingness to withdraw the Bill.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought it scarcely satisfactory that, because the Government entertained some grand views on the subject of the reform of the Land Laws, all practicable measures dealing with the question were to be set aside. He condoled with the right hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and with the right hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), at having the duty cast upon them of stifling with their own hands their own offspring; but he trusted that next Session the measure would be re-introduced.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS (1866-9).

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866-9, their administration, operation, and effect:"—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Ordered, That all Reports and Returns thereto relating be referred to the Committee.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee, That they have power to receive evidence which may be tendered concerning similar systems in British Colonies or in other Countries, and to report whether the said Contagious Diseases Acts should be maintained, extended, amended, or repealed.—(Mr. Secretary Childers.)

And, on July 9, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, MR. STANSFELD, Colonel ALEXANDER, SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, Viscount CRICHTON, MR. BURT, MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, MR. BRASSEY, MR. CORBOLD, General BURNABY, SIR HENRY WOLFF, MR. ERNEST NOEL, Colonel DIGBY, and MR. WILLIAM FOWLER:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that the rural clergy were extremely agitated

system might be devised upon the lines proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester, which would meet the difficulties of the case quite as well or better than this Bill. But assuredly something should be done, and that speedily. The want which this Bill was introduced to supply was a want participated in to the full extent by Scotland and England, quite as much as it was by Ireland. He believed that the want of some such provision for the settlement of local questions as was contained in this Bill had done more to strengthen Home Rule, in the sense in which the expression was generally used in Great Britain, than any other thing. [Mr. PARNELL dissented.] The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) shook his head. There was no necessity for introducing any acrimony into the discussion of this question. But in Glasgow a great number of persons were constantly complaining of the necessity of coming up to London to settle every small question, and were asking if Home Rule would not do away with that necessity and difficulty. It would; but that was not the question before them. The question was whether it could not be equally well settled by such a proposal as that contained in the Bill, and whether the Members of the House could not find themselves more in accord in adopting such a proposal than by waiting until they could carry the more extensive and radical measures of Home Rule. He had great pleasure, as the Representative of a Scotch constituency, in supporting the Bill; and he trusted that the Government would deal with the question involved in its principles speedily, and not with reference to Ireland only, but with reference to Scotland and England also.

MR. GREGORY said, that, so far his experience went, the Committees of the House of Commons and Lords did justice with regard to all Private Bills. As regarded the clauses which were inserted, they were, in all cases scrutinized by the counsel of the Chairman of Committees in the one House and of the Speaker in the other, who could be entirely relied upon. Committees of the House were very jealous of local inquiries, and he had seen them upset after considerable outlay. Local inquiries had worked satisfactorily enough when their decisions were given effect to in Provisional Orders; but, otherwise, they had generally resulted in failure, of which Lord Dalhousie's Commission was a remarkable illustration. He thought, however, that a good deal of unnecessary expense was incurred in bringing witnesses to London to give evidence on merely local questions.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, in the few observations which he would make he would confine himself to the effect the proposed Bill would have if adopted upon the great industrial efforts and improvements made in Ireland. He might instance railway companies; and he could state that if it were not for the great expense attending Private Bills a great many more railway works would be set on foot. In the Bill recently before Parliament it was proposed that the extension of railways should be left to presentment sessions; and if a local inquiry was held in every case, it would have the effect of preventing the adoption of chimerical or bogus schemes. There was another important point—namely, the reclamation of waste lands—and in these he included lands which were only partially drained. To carry out to any extent a scheme for the reclamation of land it was necessary to come to Parliament for fresh powers to undertake them, and this would involve a great cost, which would have the effect of preventing any action from being taken. Inquiries held in Ireland then would facilitate such useful operations as the drainage of waste lands. Then in regard to the fishing population, a great deal could be done in the way of starting some 10 or 12 fishermen to maintain a number of boats together. Under present circumstances, that would necessitate great expense; but local inquiry would do much to meet the difficulty, and it was admitted by a Gentleman on the Treasury Bench that some change in the present system of dealing with Private Bills was desirable. He thought it would not be difficult to define the remedy. If local inquiries with regard to the development of Irish industries could be established, he had no doubt that substantial benefit would result therefrom. If the House did not approve of the details of the Bill, he hoped that it would affirm the principle.

MR. P. MARTIN hoped the House would affirm the principle of the Bill

The clergy of his diocese felt strongly that the provision would not prevent non-Christian services, the more especially as the clause did not provide any penalty for non-Christian services, though there was for disorderly services. Whatever might be its intention, the clause was practically inoperative, and he believed it would vanish from the Bill. The Convocation Clause, which referred to certain amendments of the Burials Rubrics carried in Convocation, and scheduled in the Bill, was a practical matter, and deserved the serious attention both of the clergy and laity of the Church of England. Briefly, it amounted to this—that whereas under the existing Burial Laws of the Church there were three classes of persons over whom the Burial Service might not be read, the amended Rubrics in the clause would allow the clergy, with the consent of the kindred of the deceased, to read two alternative services. The title was not his, but he knew that they had already been styled second and third-class Burial Services. That did not remove the real grievance of the clergy, which was that at present they were obliged to read the Burial Service over the greatest reprobate, if he had been baptized or had not committed suicide. Under this Bill the clergy would be obliged to bury those persons whom the Dissenting ministers might have pronounced to be too bad for them to bury. On the other hand, what relief was offered to the clergy? They might read over these unhappy deceased persons who were thus handed over to them one or other of the alternative Burial Services, provided they obtained the consent of the very persons who had the most special and intense interest in refusing that permission, and in preventing dishonour from being done to the remains of their relations, and a slur from being cast on the family under the provisions of this Act. Was it probable or possible that the clergy would feel a sense of relief in such a provision as that? Human nature throughout the dioceses of England generally was an average human nature, and it was against human nature if it was expected that this clause would be largely successful in relieving the clergy. He asked their Lordships to look at the enormous price which the clergy had to pay for the boon, small as it was, of having an alternative service. If the clause passed, this would be the result. The clergy would be compelled to give a certificate of character to every one of the parishioners they buried. If they performed the full Burial Service, that would amount to a declaration that the deceased was worthy of it; if they did not, that would be declaration that the deceased was not worthy of it. That was a painful and terrible dilemma in which to place the clergy. But he would also ask how it would affect the laity? Were they to assent to the imposing of a necessity on clergymen of pronouncing a post mortem judgment in the case of every member of their families who died, and authorize the clergy to go to kindred and friends and worry them as to the form of the Burial Service? Who were “the kindred” under this Bill? Would the cousin, or the cousin once removed, come within that category? The next of kin might be a person who differed from the deceased in religion, or between whom and the deceased there had been positive enmity. He might be a person whom the deceased had disinherited. Was the kinsman who had been cut off with a shilling to come and consult with the widow as to the prayers which were to be read over the person who had cut him off? The most rev. Primate and some of his right rev. Brethren were so enamoured of this clause, that they were ready to run the risk of wrecking the Bill in August next by re-inserting it. On account of it they rose to a height of courage in favour of the Bill to which he did not feel himself able to ascend. The most rev. Primate advocated the clause as embodying a recommendation of Convocation and removing a grievance suffered by the clergy. It did remove one grievance, but it was by inflicting another. He ventured to say that such a clause would stir up strife and bitterness in every parish in the land. Instead of the small grievance which existed now between the clergy and the Dissenters, it would lead to a much larger one between the clergy and their parishioners. He might mention that, at a large and important meeting of the clergy in his own diocese, held on the preceding day, the conclusion was come to that the clause would give rise to more painful difficulties and more occasions of strife in parishes than it removed, and they, therefore, ing of the Bill. It simply established a principle of a general character, and certainly would be of enormous advantage in relieving the House of what had been over and over again complained of—not from one side, but from both sides of the House—namely, that they undertook a vast quantity of Business which they found it utterly unable adequately to perform. The noble Lord the present Secretary of State for India, in strong terms, had regretted the House had to undertake Business which it was totally unable to discharge. That was the strongest argument for the transfer to local bodies of a great portion of the legislation undertaken by the House; and the noble Lord said the House would give a favourable consideration to any proposal which might desire to transfer to local bodies business of a character which might be transacted by them. The Bill was not one introduced by a section of Irish Members alone, but had received very general approval; and he hoped, under these circumstances, the House would agree to its second reading.

MR. FOLEY said, he thought the Bill was necessary, not so much in the interest of railway companies, or the promoters of various undertakings, as in the interest of the ratepayers who had to pay for them. He contended that great cost was incurred, in many instances, when difficulties arose, without the ratepayers frequently having an opportunity to express an opinion until the measure was absolutely adopted. In his own township, a loan of £10,000 was required, and it cost £6,000 to obtain that loan; so that the ratepayers had to pay £16,000 when they could only expend £10,000. He believed local inquiries on the spot concerned would obviate many of the present difficulties and inconveniences; and he therefore trusted the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH).

ARREST OF MR. BRADLAUGH.

The Serjeant at Arms informed the House that, in obedience to the Order of the House of this day, and in conformity with Mr. Speaker's Warrant, he had taken Mr. Charles Bradlaugh into his custody.

Mr. P. Martin

LOCAL INQUIRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, his experience was that it was not at all advisable that the whole of the Private Bill Business of the country should be transacted upstairs; and he thought the measure of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Fay) was well worthy of consideration, and might be extended to Scotland, and, perhaps, to portions of England. The present system was a great scandal, and on the ground of economy alone a complete change was necessary. It was a system which common sense and public opinion would not long tolerate, especially as it had a tendency to restrict industrial enterprise. It formed one of the strongest arguments for Home Rule. Complaints were also frequently made of the arbitrary ruling of the autocrat in "another place."

MR. BLAKE, in supporting the Bill, said, there were many useful enterprises that were rendered impossible or were retarded on account of the expense and inconvenience of the present system of Parliamentary inquiry. As an instance, he would refer to the case of Waterford, from whence a Bill was presented for the benefit of the town, which the Commons passed, but which the Lords rejected through mere capriciousness. The expenditure for the promotion of this Bill—£1,400—fell upon the promoters, and the locality was deprived of a Bill which would be of the greatest possible advantage. If the preliminary stages of the Bill had taken place in Ireland instead of London, Waterford would now be deriving one advantage of having a most useful measure in operation.

MR. LITTON said, the measure before the House was one upon which Irish Members were almost, if not entirely, unanimous, and great weight ought, he thought, to be attached to the fact that Gentlemen representing large constituencies in Ireland were of the same opinion on the subject. It was not only the matter of expense in connection with large undertakings; but rather in many of the small matters that the grievance was felt. The cost of promoting schemes moderate in themselves was so great that many small improvements, which would have brought great and last-

The clergy of his diocese felt strongly that the provision would not prevent non-Christian services, the more especially as the clause did not provide any penalty for non-Christian services, though there was for disorderly services. Was it probable or possible that the clergy would feel a sense of relief in such a provision as that? Human nature throughout the dioceses of England generally was an average human nature, and it was against human nature if it was expected that this clause would be largely successful in relieving the clergy. He asked their Lordships to look at the enormous price which the clergy had to pay for the boon, small as it was, of having an alternative service. If the

Was the kinsman who had been cut off with a shilling to come and consult with the widow as to the prayers which were to be read over the person who had cut him off? The most rev. Primate and some of his right rev. Brethren were so enamoured of this clause, that they were ready to run the risk of wrecking the Bill in August next by re-inserting it. On account of it they rose to a height of courage in favour of the Bill to which he did not feel himself able to ascend. The most rev. Primate advocated the clause as embodying a recommendation of Convocation and removing a grievance suffered by the clergy. It did remove one grievance, but it was by inflicting another. He ventured to say that such a clause would stir up strife and bitterness in every parish in the land. Instead of the small grievance which existed now between the clergy and the Dissenters, it would lead to a much larger one between the clergy and their parishioners. He might mention that, at a large and important meeting of the clergy in his own diocese, held on the preceding day, the conclusion was come to that the clause would give rise to more painful difficulties and more occasions of strife in parishes than it removed, and they, therefore, merely because the recital of its object was correct. It was necessary to see that the object was likely to be attained. Now, here, he must say, he could not find in the enacting clauses any principles, except that of committing inquiries to a Parliamentary Committee sitting during the Recess, thereby causing the difficulties to which he had alluded. He admitted that the present was a state of things which should not continue, and he hoped before very long means would be devised to put an end to it, so that Inquiries as to the desirability of constructing railway, water, and other works for particular localities should be conducted by some process the better part of which would be conducted on the spot and not in the House; but he could not see his way to accepting the method proposed in the Bill. He hoped, under those circumstances, the Bill would not be pressed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, if these proceedings had taken place in a Committee Room, and had the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) been in the position of Chairman, the decision which he had just announced would have found expression in a phrase very favourable to the progress of a Bill—namely, "The Preamble is proved." The necessity of legislation was admitted, and such legislation could not be very long delayed. He regretted very much that the hon. and learned Member for Tipperary (Mr. P. J. Smyth), who introduced the Bill on a previous occasion, was precluded by form from taking part in the debate. He had only arrived at a time when the proceedings of the House were somewhat interrupted, and so had not yet taken the Oath. Had he been present, he would have been able to suggest Amendments which might be introduced in Committee, and which would remove those difficulties to which the Attorney General for Ireland had referred. Those difficulties, especially the delay, were, no doubt, of a very substantial character; but he would have expected from a Gentleman holding the position of the Attorney General for Ireland, and who admitted the principle, that he would have given the House the benefit of his known experience, and have suggested a way in which the difficulties could be removed. He, however, had not done so; but he had dimly referred to some machinery by which those inconveniences could be removed, and these private measures dealt with in Ireland. Now, he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) would have the assent of the whole Home Rule Party in giving the right hon. and learned Gentleman this warning and this information—that it would be found utterly impossible to transfer to any but an elected Irish body, and to a body possessing the hereditary qualifications for legislation like the Irish Peers, the right to deal with Private Bill legislation. There was in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech the foreshadowing of an idea of a new Board of officials of some kind. ["No, no!"] He feared there was a suggestion foreshadowed that, by means of official machinery, this Private Bill Inquiry might be worked out. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Law): No, no!] He feared that suggestion would be made, for, apparently, there was no idea of using the legislative force that came from Ireland; but let this be borne in mind by those who considered the measure—no attempt to transfer to Irish officials the jurisdiction over Private Bills now enjoyed by the House of Commons in London would be entertained by the Home Rule Party. There was an easy means of remedying the defects the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to; but not by the machinery of the Local Government Board, the Board of Works, or any new Board formed by their side. If it was right and desirable that Irish Peers and Irish Members should consider Irish Bills in Committee in Dublin, it was equally desirable and necessary that they should discharge other duties with regard to Private Bills, and there would be no difficulty about it, as they would meet there after the sitting of Parliament. But he wished to take advantage of the admission of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that some remedy was required to ask what was proposed, and to assure him that any transference of the kind he had mentioned would meet with uncompromising opposition.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I can only repeat to a great extent the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law). I think the case of the necessity for reform in this matter has been most abundantly proved. It is quite clear there is very great inconvenience in having all these inquiries the right rev. Prelate. Now, what was the upshot of the right rev. Prelate's speech? It was a speech in favour of Mr. Osborne Morgan's Bill.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: Hear, hear!—in preference to this.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was not in favour of Mr. Osborne Morgan's Bill; but he thought the Bill now before the House was a fair mode of treating the question. On the one hand, it met a demand made by the Nonconformists; and on the other, there was a concession made to the clergy of the Church of England. Whatever might have been the motives of his right rev. Brother in assisting to draw up the recommendations of Convocation, he could say that if his right rev. Brother meant those recommendations to be a means of preventing their Lordships from ever taking up the Burials Bill, certainly that was not the view of the majority of those who concurred in them. He understood that the right rev. Prelate was not in favour of the clause which prescribed the character of the service which might be conducted at the grave; but, seeing that it was a safe-guard for Christian services, he was surprised that his right rev. Brother should have so expressed himself in regard to it as to lead possibly to its ultimate omission from the Bill. He had yet to learn that it was likely that their Lordships would approve of what his right rev. Brother seemed to say—namely, that they ought, on principles of religious equality, to permit secular services in their churchyards.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH begged the most rev. Prelate's pardon. He had said that he valued the clause highly because of its assertion that the burial should be Christian, but thought in practice it would be inoperative.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY thought it very undesirable that on such a point the right rev. Prelate should have expressed himself in such a way as to lead to a misapprehension of his words. He had understood the right rev. Prelate, by way of objection, to say that to introduce the word "Christian" was in opposition to the principle of religious equality.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH rose to Order. The statement of the most rev. Prelate was a misrepresentation of his words.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he had certainly understood his right rev. Brother to argue against the retention of the word "Christian," both on the ground he had already stated, and because the introduction of the word would not prevent Mormons and other sects from having secular services. Moreover, his right rev. Brother had argued that the principle of accepting a man's declaration that he was a Christian would enable anyone to get permission for a non-Christian service by declaring himself a Christian one day, though he might not make the same profession the next. The speech of his right rev. Brother was calculated to do infinite mischief to the Bill and infinite mischief to himself. He thought that, on cool and calm reflection, the right rev. Prelate would come to the conclusion that it would have been better for the Church, for their Lordships' House, and for himself, that he had not made these remarks on the word "Christian;" for certainly they were calculated to encourage an effort in the other House of Parliament to have it expunged. It was very undesirable that a Prelate of the Church of England should before that House even appear to argue against the introduction of the word "Christian" into such a Bill as this, and to vilify those who claimed liberty of conscience and the right to perform their ministrations in the churchyards, by saying that to-day they would declare themselves Christians, and to-morrow assume the character of heathens. He spoke with some warmth, because he thought the occasion required it. While he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) took upon himself the whole blame which his right rev. Brother seemed to impute to him, of being willing to run the risk even of losing the Bill rather than lose its religious character, he believed that, in expressing himself as he had done upon this particular point, he was expressing the general feeling both of the clergy and of the laity in this country.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH hoped the House would not accept the interpretation put upon his words by the most rev. Prelate. It would be in the recollection of the House that he had said not one word against the word "Christian." On the contrary, he expressed his approval of it as a testimony of the opinion of the Legislature that drawn; otherwise I shall feel it my duty to move the Previous Question, and, as a matter of form, I must take that step now, in the possibility of the hon. Member not complying.

Motion made, and Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT saw no reason why Irish professional men should not have the advantage of conducting these inquiries in their own country. At the same time, he thought Irish Members should be content with the assurance given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and withdraw the Bill. He was satisfied that whatever the right hon. Gentleman said he meant.

MR. M'LAREN said, he took an interest in this Bill, because the same principle as was contained in it was applicable to Scotland. There was in it a demand that had been made there for many years. The evil was felt very strongly indeed in the North, and a desire for some such arrangement was almost universal amongst those who had to do with private legislation. He did not, however, agree with the clauses of the Bill, as he thought it would be easy to establish a better plan.

An hon. MEMBER wished to suggest to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that, as he had expressed his approval of the principle of the Preamble, he would, probably, when they came to deal with the measure, as promised by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, find it useful to look into the provisions of two Bills which were brought in on this subject in 1872 by Mr. Pim and others, because he thought that, to a certain extent, the first part of the Bill was defective. By looking at the Bills to which he referred, many valuable suggestions might be received by the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. FAY, out of deference to the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, asked leave to withdraw the Bill. He was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the cordial answer he had given.

MIDDLESEX LAND REGISTRY BILL.

(Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Gregory, Sir Thomas Chambers.)

[BILL 142.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOPWOOD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it originated in the wants of a large number of building societies, who were much interested in the proper registration of land titles, and the object of which was to make a registry which had existed for more than 100 years, and was confessedly in a most complicated and useless state, a working registry, assuring people interested in the purchase and conveyance of land something like certainty of title by establishing a system of registration similar to what prevailed in Scotland. The Bill was practically that which the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) introduced last Session, and he trusted it would meet with favourable consideration at the hands of the Government. The Bill commenced by repealing the statute of Queen Anne relating to the registration of land, and proposed to bring the matter under the direction of the Lord Chancellor as far as the regulation of the system was concerned. It further proposed that all the necessary local description of the property should be registered, and that its operation should extend not merely to the county of Middlesex, its original limit, but to the Metropolis generally, as defined by the Metropolis Local Management Act. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that at the commencement of last Session he, as Chairman of the Committee which had sat to consider this question, had introduced a tentative measure, founded on the Scotch system. The Bill now before the House was practically the same measure; and speaking, as he did, on behalf of the Government, he found himself in the awkward position of having to oppose its second reading. In the language of the late Prime Minister, "a good deal had happened" since the time of which he had spoken, and the Government had promised to lay before Parliament measures dealing with the whole question of land transfer, of which this question of registration formed a part. Under those circumstances, it could hardly be expected that at this stage of the Session they would be prepared to enter into a piece-meal discussion of this particular measure. He trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with his promise that the Government would give the subject their best attention, and would not press his measure.

MR. GREGORY, approving of the principle of the Bill, expressed his regret that the Government were not prepared to accept it at once; but trusted they would deal with the question at as early a period as possible.

SIR HENRY JACKSON hoped there would be time before the House adjourned to move a direct negative to a Bill which, although an apparently innocent, was really a most objectionable measure. It was an amiable attempt to patch up a system which every lawyer knew by experience to be very costly, and, if not mischievous, at best useless in its effect, and instead of amending it would, by continuing the system of registration of assurances, tend to keep back the reform of land transfer, which, in his judgment, depended entirely on registration of title. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Henry Jackson.)

MR. HOPWOOD signified his willingness to withdraw the Bill.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought it scarcely satisfactory that, because the Government entertained some grand views on the subject of the reform of the Land Laws, all practicable measures dealing with the question were to be set aside. He condoled with the right hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and with the right hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), at having the duty cast upon them of stifling with their own hands their own offspring; but he trusted that next Session the measure would be re-introduced.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that the rural clergy were extremely agitated

about this measure, and expressed a hope that some time might be allowed to elapse between the passage of the Bill and the Act coming into operation, as he believed such an interval would diminish the heart-burning and cause the measure to work much more smoothly than if it came into operation speedily.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH, who reminded their Lordships that he had taken no part in the debates or divisions on the Bill, wished to say a few words before the measure reached the House of Commons, where, he believed, its real value would be settled and its fate would be decided. He was not about to trouble their Lordships with any expression of opinion on the principle of the Bill. That principle their Lordships had affirmed, not only on the second reading of this measure, but by a Resolution passed three years ago; and it would be preposterous in him to suppose that anything he could now say would induce their Lordships to alter their determination on that point. He wished, however, to say a few words on the results that he expected to see follow the passing of the Bill. And first, he would remark that he feared it would not be very long before the principle and its corollaries which had been applied in this case would be brought to bear on other acres besides "God's acre." He hoped it would not be so; but he thought he saw symptoms of it in Ireland, and in England a growing tendency in the same direction. He thought their Lordships might anticipate that the Amendments passed on the Motion of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Mount Edgcumbe) and the right rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York) would vanish in "another place;" for if anyone thought that for the sake of Amendments carried by such narrow majorities, and on which the Episcopate was divided, their Lordships' House would throw out the Bill when it came back to them again, at the risk of keeping the question open for another nine months and getting a worse Bill at the end of that time, he thought that person would find himself mistaken. He remembered the history of the Irish Church Act, and he could not but think that proved it. He wished to express his unfeigned gratitude to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for the anxiety he had shown to do justice to the clergy; but, in the two essential particulars in which Her Majesty's Government had departed from Mr. Osborne Morgan's Bill, they had not succeeded in effecting what was really desired by the clergy. That he had ascertained to be the feeling of a large majority of the clergy of his diocese. One of the two points to which he referred was the provision that all burials under the Bill should be Christian; the other was the concession to the feelings and difficulties of the clergy known generally amongst them as the Convocation Clause. The former provision was open to the peril arising from the fact that it was a distinct violation of the principle of religious equality. It was perfectly clear that the clause would encounter violent opposition in "another place" from two parties—one, that large party, who hated the Church of England a little more than they loved Christianity; and the second, that smaller but resolute party, who hated Christianity a little more than they hated the Church of England. How far the Government, and especially the Prime Minister, would be able to resist the union of those two forces it was not for him to say. He valued the clause himself, because it was a recognition by the Legislature of the principle that the services in churchyards ought to be Christian; but if those parties succeeded in striking it out of the Bill, he thought that in practice it would very little matter. It seemed to him utterly impossible to frame in any Act of Parliament a definition of Christianity. If anyone could have succeeded in doing that it was the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. What the clause in reality did was not to define the nature of the Burial Service, but the profession or denomination of the person who was to perform it. The result was that any service might be used by any person, male or female, who on the occasion professed himself or herself to be a Christian. The Rev. Charles Voysey had written a letter to show that a particular congregation would be precluded from using a really Christian service which contained the Lord's Prayer and extracts from Scripture, because they would not call themselves Christian. A person who professed himself a Christian for a single day and abandoned the title the next day, might succeed in having an un-Christian service performed at the grave.

dsecration of "God's acre" by allowing it to be used by people whose religious opinions do not agree with theirs. Then, again, there are others who complain of the great hardship they suffer from not being permitted to have a portion of "God's acre." But though I trust that the hour may never arrive when the recognition of a Supreme Governor of this world will cease to be the profession of the inhabitants of this country, still, my Lords, I cannot but feel that this institution of what is called "God's acre," is one which is really not adapted to the country which we inhabit, the times in which we live, and the spirit of the age. What I should like to see would be a settlement of this question by shutting up all "God's acres" throughout the country. I think the churchyard of the Ordained clergyman and the graveyard of the Dissenting minister alike, are institutions which are prejudicial to the health of the people of this country; and their health ought to be, if not the first, at any rate one of the first, considerations of a statesman. Now, we have been moving gradually in the direction of these views, and there has been for some years a notion, soon about to amount, I believe, to a conviction, that the institution of existing churchyards is one highly prejudicial to the public health. I think it would be a much wiser step if we were to say that the time has arrived, seeing the vast increase of population in this country and the further increase which we may contemplate, when we should close all these churchyards, and when we should take steps for furnishing every community with a capacious and ample cemetery placed in a situation in which, while it would meet all the requirements of the society for which it was intended, would exercise no prejudicial influence on the public health. These are views which I am convinced are sound; and if they had been entertained, as ultimately they must be, and if the health of the country had been considered, there would have been no reason whatever for the legislation now before us which, in its ultimate consequences, may be highly prejudicial to this country, and which tends, in my opinion, to keep alive feelings of opposition and mutual distrust among different classes of the population which it would be better to cause to subside and to discourage. Well, then, I may be asked—"If these be really your opinions, why do you now support this Bill? If you think that it is an unjust and an unwise Bill; if you think that it is a Bill which, in its ultimate consequences, will be hostile to the interests of the Church of England, why are you allowing it to pass the third reading without opposition?" To this I must answer that I support the Bill with great regret, and only because, from what I have observed in this House, I am convinced that opposition would be fruitless, and fruitless opposition is a kind of opposition which I never care much to encourage. When I am frequently appealed to to fight what is called the battle of the Church, I must frankly reply, it is quite impossible to stand up for a privilege which the ordained clergy of this country enjoy, and which, in my opinion, is exercised for the welfare and benefit of the country, when you find that you are opposed in such attempts by the Prelates of the Church of England itself. When the two most rev. Prelates and at least half the Episcopal Bench support a particular course, you cannot persuade the country that in resisting a proposal sanctioned by such high authority you are actuated by any but Party or factious motives. I listened with great attention the other night, when the second reading of the Bill was moved, to the speech of the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Lincoln; and it appeared to me that a more able and earnest speech than that which he delivered was seldom addressed on this subject to your Lordships. I entirely agreed with the right rev. Prelate on that occasion, and I thought to myself the effect that he has produced is so decided, and the balance of opinions upon subjects of this kind seems so equal, that it will be well to take the opinion of the House. But when I found the right rev. Prelate was answered immediately by the highest authority in the House on such a subject, I felt that it would be almost impossible that the appeal of the right rev. Prelate could succeed. This is why I now think it is in vain to attempt to prevent the progress of this measure. The measure, I feel, in any circumstances would have been a harsh and unjust measure, though there might have been reasons of State which would have justified it. It is necessary some-desired its omission from the Bill. Three years ago the most rev. Prelate was not so enamoured of the opinion of Convocation and the clergy; and he begged to remind the most rev. Prelate and their Lordships' House that there had been a more recent utterance from the clergy of the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury than the recommendation in question. He was sure that when the clergy complained that they were not sufficiently represented in Convocation, and the laity that they were not represented in it at all, rather cold comfort was given them by telling them that this dangerous clause was approved of by Convocation. Moreover, he had to point out that those amended Rubrics re-adopted by Convocation were passed in different circumstances. He took part in framing them, though at the time he expressed misgivings as to the result; but those amended Rubrics were framed, not to form part of a Burials Bill, but to prevent a Burials Bill from being passed. ["Hear, hear!"] Precisely so; and he would add this fact, that these clauses were introduced for the purpose of giving relief to the unbaptized Dissenter, whose case had been supported by no one more powerfully than by the most rev. Prelate who had somewhat sarcastically cheered his remarks. The necessity for the amended Rubrics was therefore gone with this Bill; for, although it was supposed to give relief to the clergy by empowering them to read the shorter service over the unbaptized, yet in case a Baptist came to a clergyman to bury his child, and the clergyman said, "I can only read the inferior service," what would be the answer? "Thank you for nothing, I can have the full service read by myself, or by our own minister." To use the Rubrics of Convocation in this Bill was to use clauses passed with one object for another never intended and never wished for by the authors. The same Convocation which recommended those Rubrics, recommended that there should be no Parliamentary legislation with respect to them till certain of the relations between Convocation and Parliament underwent alteration. This application of the Rubrics was, therefore, in the teeth of that recommendation of Convocation. After this, he trusted they would hear less of the defence of the clause founded on the recommendation of Convocation. He had only further to remark that he was deeply struck, at the meeting he referred to, and in other conferences with the clergy, at the growing readiness to yield to the Bill, when passed, a loyal, patient, and a dignified submission. The clergy felt, rightly or wrongly, that they were deeply wounded by this Bill. He had regarded it as his duty as a Bishop to press on the clergy this consideration—how undignified and how unworthy it would be if they were to offer a petulant obstruction to the Bill; and that their duty was to endeavour that this Bill, when passed, should work with as little friction and as little offence and as much ease and kindness and goodwill as possible. And every one of those present at the meeting rose, one after another, to say how entirely it was their desire, loyally and fairly and honestly to carry out this Act, and to oppose no undue or frivolous obstruction to it. One most rev. Prelate, some nights ago, had referred to the angry letters he had received from clergymen with reference to this Bill. He also had received angry letters; but he could not help thinking that as time went on those feelings would wear away. It was not merely the clergy of the Church of England who would require to exercise forbearance; it was to be feared that there would be on the part of Nonconformists exhibitions of feeling which it would be well that the leaders of that party should do all in their power to prevent. With the view to the better closing of the controversy, he most earnestly appealed to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to allow a few months or a year to elapse between the passing of the Bill and its coming into operation; and he felt certain that in this matter the Bishops and clergy would be true to their Ordination vow, and promote peace and goodwill among those intrusted to their charge.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he heartily concurred in the closing remarks of his right rev. Brother; but he could not agree in the remarks made by him in the earlier portion of his speech. Whatever his right rev. Brother might think of his views of Convocation, or of the weight to which its resolutions were entitled, Convocation was a better representative of the clergy than was the meeting attended a few days ago by

The measure, I feel, in any circumstances would have been a harsh and unjust measure, though there might have been reasons of State which would have justified it. It is necessary some-

all funerals under the Bill should be Christian. What he had argued was that, notwithstanding its value in this respect, it would be practically inoperative. It was a most cruel injustice of the most rev. Prelate to charge him, a Bishop of the English Church, with having so far forgotten himself as to express a desire to exclude the word "Christian" from the clause, so that the Bill should not retain its Christian character. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad to hear that noble Lords opposite understood the words that fell from his lips. He distinctly asserted that he had made use of no such words; and, as to imputing anything to the most rev. Prelate, the fact was that what he referred to was a different clause altogether—that allowing alternative services to the clergy—and, so far from suggesting that the most rev. Prelate was to blame for desiring to retain the words in question, he was himself desirous of retaining them, although he expressed his belief that they would be inoperative. As to forgetting himself, he was perfectly prepared to again repeat and take the responsibility of what he had said; but, with all humility to one who, although he was his ecclesiastical superior, yet, in that House, should remember that he spoke only as his Peer, he protested against the imputation which, with all the weight of his character and position, the most rev. Prelate had made against him. He never said a word approaching the expression of a wish or desire that the word "Christian," in reference to the services under the Bill, should be omitted from the clause. Such an accusation was monstrous, perfectly monstrous.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY was extremely glad that the right rev. Prelate had removed a misapprehension, and made a distinct declaration of his wish to maintain the word "Christian;" but he regretted that the right rev. Prelate felt it necessary to adhere to his line of argument in reference to the insertion of that word.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I think it would have been desirable if the most rev. Prelate and the right rev. Prelate could have managed to be of the same opinion upon this Bill. It is one of great difficulty, and the subject is rendered more perplexing by the opposite opinions given by the right rev. and the most rev. Prelates, which are so contrary one to the other. I have not now risen to oppose the third reading of this Bill, though my opinion is unchanged as to its character. I think it an unjust and an unwise Bill, and I have not heard any arguments yet which have shown me that all the reasons which have been applied to the churchyards do not equally apply to the churches themselves. I have heard remarks on the subject; but I have heard no arguments against that view of the question. We have been told in the course of the debate something in reference to the Church of Ireland. It was said you disestablished the Church of Ireland, and that was a much greater measure than this, and that although the Roman Catholics had for some years the privilege of using the parish churchyards, they never urged any claim to the possession of the churches. There may be various reasons for that course of conduct. Whatever may be said of the errors of the Roman Catholic Church, no one can impute to it a want of good taste; but as to the Protestant churches of Ireland, they are not such as those who appreciate the beauty of holiness would be particularly anxious to possess. That has been stated as one of the reasons why the Roman Catholic population of Ireland never laid any claim to those churches. But that will not apply to the churches of England, which are beautiful and are made more beautiful every year by the devotion and the taste of the wealthy congregations of this country; but whether that devotion and taste will continue after this Bill passes, and after the consequences of the Bill have been seen, will, I think, be doubtful. This Bill appears to me to be unjust for many reasons, and particularly for one primary reason, which no person has yet grappled with. Every ordained clergyman of the Church of England will be obliged to open the churchyard to all sects, while he is not to enjoy the use of their graveyards for his parishioners in the same parish; and I cannot understand how such inequality could be brought forward in a Bill of this nature, which assumes to be founded on justice and equality. This is not only an unjust Bill, but an unwise one. We hear much about "God's acre." There are those who call upon the House not to sanction the confess, I was somewhat astonished at the opposition he raised to the clauses, because that opposition might have been better raised in Committee. I cannot pretend that the right rev. Prelate's speech is one that will assist the Government much in "another place" in obtaining those restrictions which, rightly or wrongly, have met the approbation of your Lordships' House. The right rev. Prelate seemed to me to lay down clearly—though he afterwards explained he was in favour of the restrictions—how they were utterly inconsistent with the principles of religious freedom on which the Bill was supposed to be founded. On the whole, I have only to thank the right rev. Prelate for having reserved his eloquence to this stage of the Bill—an eloquence which, though not of an especially episcopal character, is always appreciated in this House. His speech to-night might at an earlier stage have influenced opinion and affected votes. I am still more grateful to the noble Earl the late Prime Minister for the line which he has taken. He has denounced the Bill as a strong measure. But I am struck by the character of the observations which he has reserved for this period of the question. At an earlier period his remarks might have had a great effect upon the House. I do not doubt for a moment the perfect sincerity of the noble Earl. But I cannot think it was merely the speech of the right rev. Prelate which convinced the late Prime Minister that it was expedient on the whole to settle this vexed question. I must think that there were other considerations. But I must say that, after the very severe denunciation of the Bill by the noble Earl, it is a great satisfaction to me that the only alternative which he can propose is that all the churchyards in the country should be closed. Is the noble Earl aware that that alternative would involve the closing of 12,000 churchyards, many of them in country districts and in a condition not unsanitary? I think, therefore, that I have reason to be grateful to him for his speech to-night, and more especially as he has indicated the only possible alternative course—a course which, I am sure, will be utterly unsatisfactory to your Lordships.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, who was almost inaudible in the Gallery, was understood to say that he hoped that the Bill would be loyally accepted by both parties as a final settlement of the question. The proposals of the Bill, he hoped, would be met in a fair and not a hostile spirit by both parties. It was a difficult thing, no doubt, in the course of the discussion to avoid acerbities being developed; but he candidly expressed the hope that after this measure had become law the feelings of both parties would be very different from what they had seemed to be in the past. He trusted there would be no show of victory or defeat on either side—feelings which ought not to arise in regard to such a question.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) trusted that those who would take up this Bill in "another place" would show the same conciliatory spirit which had been displayed during the progress of the Bill in this House. If that were done, a settlement would be arrived at without further delay.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not but thank the noble Earl who had just sat down for his wise and very conciliatory and useful remarks to their Lordships in this stage of the measure. It did appear to him that all of them, whatever their opinions might be, were bound to do their best to facilitate such a settlement of this question as should be on the whole best for the peace and harmony of all classes of their fellow-Christians and fellow-subjects. It was with profound regret that he had heard the remarks of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough). No doubt, those remarks proceeded from the most sincere conviction and the best possible motives; but the speech was of a very different tendency from those to which the House had just listened. In his opinion, the speech of the right rev. Prelate would tend not to promote harmony. But there were two things mentioned by the right rev. Prelate for which he was grateful. In the first place, he was grateful for his kind appreciation of his own sincere endeavours to be just in dealing with this matter—to do all in his power, not, indeed, to make the Bill acceptable to the majority of the clergy, for that he could not do, but, in framing its provisions, to arrive at as just and equitable an arrangement as possible. He owned he saw no better way to times to make proposals in politics which are unjust to a considerable section of the community in consequence of the demands of the public welfare. But here it was otherwise. I feel, however, that resistance is impossible, and that, in these circumstances, what we should most desire would be that the Bill should pass and should be sent to the other House with those modifying clauses in it which have been introduced by the Lord Chancellor and other Members of your Lordships' House. If they—as I will hope—bear some balm to the injured feelings of the great body of the clergy of the country, I think it highly desirable that they should be passed. But, even if they pass, I cannot but express my regret that this Bill should have ever been introduced, or that there should have been any assumed necessity to have recourse to such legislation. It is in my mind legislation which is opposed to the circumstances in which we live. I think the direction in which we ought to have moved would have been to have shut all these churchyards and graveyards and to have assisted the Government in some adequate proposal which would have furnished the country with cemeteries in which none of these painful controversies could have occurred, and which would have conduced to the preservation of the health and welfare of the country.

EARL FORTESCUE asked for the indulgence of their Lordships while he stated what had been his object in proposing his Amendments, all of which, except one, had been adopted. In his opinion, too many Churchmen, and clergymen especially, had met this question in an unreasonable spirit, and too many Nonconformists in an unfair spirit besides; for, while claiming the churches and churchyards as national property, they had not rested until they were freed from all share in the expense of maintaining and repairing those churches and keeping those churchyards in order. Too much importance was attributed to consecrated ground. He thought that the attitude adopted by many with regard to it was not only unreasonable, but un-Christian in its tendency. They must remember that the remains of the greatest saints and martyrs of our Church had not rested in consecrated ground, nor those of many of the noblest heroes and patriots of our own and other countries. Revelation taught us that the dead were not affected by burial. The only good to be considered was the good of the living in the widest sense. That good would in this and many other Church matters be best consulted by acting on the principle—"Let all things be done decently and in order." There had been much said on both sides with which he could not sympathize. Still he thought the Dissenters had grievances which ought to be removed in such a way as to prevent the question being re-opened; but that the feelings of the clergy, whether reasonable or unreasonable, should as far as possible be respected. As to gifts of land for churchyards, he thought that such gifts, if of recent date, should, if the donors wished it, be preserved according to their original intention, in order to prevent the flow of such liberality being checked. He had been a donor himself, and he was then making arrangements to extend a churchyard. But his wish was that such land for churchyards as he had given should be open to services of a decent and orderly character on the part of Dissenters. In advocating the preservation of recent gifts for the Church of England, he wished it to be understood that he spoke in deference to the prejudice of others, as he had none of his own.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, having regard to the fact that this is a Government Bill, I must rise to address the House, though I have little to say on this stage of the Bill. It is a subject in which I have taken a great interest, and on which I have spoken at great length at different times; but I do not wish to inflict on your Lordships the arguments I have previously used. I cannot allow myself to think that the Bill is either unjust or harsh, or liable to the severe attack which has been made upon it by the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield). I rise rather to express my satisfaction at the tone of the debates in this House, and especially in reference to two of its Members, one of them a Prelate on the Episcopal Bench, and the other the late Prime Minister of the country, for the course they have taken in reference to this Bill. I feel exceedingly grateful to the right rev. Prelate for not opposing a measure to which it is known he dissents till the present stage, when it has practically passed the House, though, I

While he (the Lord Chancellor) did not pretend to judge as to the amount of relief to be given to the clergy, he was sure there was no foundation whatever for the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate that, as often as anyone died, it would fall on the clergy to make a classification, giving a certificate of character in some cases, and refusing in others. Unless the friends of the deceased made a request, or expressed their consent otherwise, the clergy would have no option or choice but to perform the full funeral service. There was, therefore, no foundation for that suggestion of the right rev. Prelate. Nor would there be any family council, with all the alarming consequences on which the right rev. Prelate had expatiated. The "kindred or friends" who might request or consent, would, upon a proper construction of the Schedule with the rest of the Bill, be only those who had the charge of, and were responsible for, the funeral. All these remarks were those of one who desired to destroy the whole bill. Convocation had, with the right rev. Prelate's own concurrence, deliberately resolved upon this particular mode of dealing with the subject. He ventured to hope that when this Bill went to the House of Commons, there would be sufficient liberality in that Assembly to induce them to think that, even if you could not give a great measure of relief to the clergy, it was worth while to give such a measure of relief as they had themselves asked for.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Baron Dowse and Mr. Justice Harrison, two of the Judges selected in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the County of Louth;

And from Robert Macfarlane Lord Ormrod and John Millar Lord Craighill, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of the same Act, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the County of Bute; and a Report relating to the Election for the County of Dumfriesshire.

COUNTY OF LOUTH ELECTION.

In the matter of an Election Petition presented by George Harley, Petitioner; and Philip Callan, Respondent.

We hereby certify to the Right hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons that the above-mentioned Petition was tried before us on the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th days of June instant, and that, at the conclusion of the said trial we did, on the 19th day of June instant, determine that the Petition of Philip Callan, whose Election was contested by the said Petitioner, was duly elected to serve in the present Parliament for the County of Louth.

And, in addition to the foregoing Certificate, We hereby further Report to the Right hon. the Speaker that no corrupt practice had been proved to have been committed by any Candidate at the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election.

And, further, that, on the evidence before us, it did not appear that corrupt practices had been generally prevailed at said Election, and we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevail at said Election.

We beg also to state that a copy of said Certificate accompanies this Report, and that we have caused to be forwarded to the House of Commons a copy of the evidence given at the taken down by the deputy of the short-hand writer of the House of Commons.

Given under our hands, at Dublin, this 21st day of June 1880.

RICHARD DOWSE, Baron of the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland,

MICHL. HARRISON, Judge of the High Court of Justice, Common Pleas Division, in Ireland,

Two of the Judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

To the Right Honourable
The Speaker of
The House of Commons.

COUNTY OF BUTE ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

Election for the County of Bute.

Unto the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.

Report by the Election Judges in Scotland on the Petition of Archibald McKay, residing at Osborne Place, Govan, near Glasgow, J.P. for the County of Bute; Richard Ferguson, Ironmonger in Glasgow and Millport; John Duncan, Baker and Confectioner in Glasgow; Alexander Brown, Nurseryman, Millport; and Alexander McLean, Wine and Spirit Merchant, Glasgow, and residing at Grenholm Villa, Busby, complaining of the Election on sixth April 1880, of Thomas Russell, as Member of Parliament for the County of Bute.

We, Robert Macfarlane, Lord Ormidale, and John Millar, Lord Craighill, the two Judges of the Court of Session for the trial of Election Petitions in Scotland, have to report that the Petition in this case (of which a printed copy is herewith sent and referred to) sets forth two grounds upon which the said Thomas Russell was incapable of being duly elected and returned as a Member of the House of Commons, and therefore that he was not duly elected and returned, vizt.:—

1st. That at the date of the Election he was incapable of being elected as a Member of the House of Commons, in respect of the provisions of the Act 22 Geo. III. cap. 45, entitled "An Act for restraining any person concerned in any contract, commission, or agreement made for the public service from being elected or sitting and voting as a Member of the House of Commons;" and—

2nd. That he, Mr. Russell, by himself or his agents was guilty of bribery, treating, undue influence and corrupt practices before, during, and after the Election.

That in the Petition no claim is made for the seat, the prayer of it being limited to the effect that it ought to be determined that Mr. Russell was not duly elected or returned, and that the Election was void.

We have further to report that we appointed the trial of the Petition to take place before us at Rothesay, in the said County of Bute, upon the 29th day of June next.; that on the 15th day of June 1880, a Minute (of which a copy is also sent herewith and referred to) for Mr.
Russell, subscribed by him and his Counsel, was lodged, stating that he admitted that he was disqualified in respect of the provisions of the above Act, but denying the charges of bribery, treating, undue influence, and corrupt practices, and that he was willing and anxious to proceed to trial upon these charges.

We have further to report that upon the 18th day of June 1880, a Minute (of which a printed copy is also herewith sent and referred to) was lodged for the Petitioners, stating that in respect of the Minute of 15th June for Mr.
Russell, "they did not propose to lead evidence on the allegations of bribery and treating set out in Articles 2 and 3 of the particulars intended to be proved by the Petitioners;" and craving that we should determine that Mr.
Russell was not duly elected to serve in Parliament for the County of Bute.

That in these circumstances we have to report and certify that the said Thomas Russell was not duly elected and returned, and that his Election on the sixth day of April last was void.

R. MACFARLANE,
Lord Ormidale.

JOHN MILLAR,
Lord Craighill.

Edinburgh, 23 June 1880.

COUNTY OF DUMBARTON ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

Election for the County of Dumbarton.

Unto the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.

Report by the Election Judges in Scotland on the Petition of John William Burns, of Kilmahew Castle, Cardross, Advocate, complaining of the Election, on sixth April 1880, of Archibald Orr Ewing as Member of Parliament for the County of Dumbarton.

We, Robert Macfarlane, Lord Ormidale, and John Millar, Lord Craighill, the two Judges of the Court of Session for the trial of Election
Petitions in Scotland, do report as follows:—

Leave has been given to withdraw the above Petition upon evidence by affidavits having been laid before us to the effect that such withdrawal was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, and no person, after the requisite intimation and publication, applying to be substituted as Petitioner.

R. MACFARLANE,
Lord Ormidale.

JOHN MILLAR,
Lord Craighill.

Edinburgh, 23 June, 1880.

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

METEOROLOGICAL DEPARTMENT— WEATHER FORECASTS.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can state any reason why the weather forecasts and observations procured at the public expense by the Meteorological Department, considering their great usefulness in the protection of life and property in the fishery and coasting trade, should not be freely available for posting at the coast guard stations or other suitable places at the principal ports and fishing harbours around our coasts?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The reason why the weather forecasts and observations of the Meteorological Department are not communicated to stations round the coast, as proposed by the hon. and learned Member, is that the expense of transmitting them would be large, while the grant at the disposal of the Meteorological Council is limited, and would not bear the expense without curtailing operations connected with observation. It is calculated that the cost of each receiving station could not be taken at less than £20 a-year, and the number of principal ports and fishing harbours round our coast is very considerable.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked if there would be any objection to supply the information in London to persons who were willing to telegraph it free to these stations?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would like to consult the Department on the point.

THE CASE OF MR. TAYLER.

In reply to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that it was not his intention to bring forward his Resolution with regard to the case of Mr. Tayler, inasmuch as attention would be called to the subject in "another place."

MR. CARTWRIGHT gave Notice that he would call attention to the case of Mr. Tayler, and move a Resolution.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE —REPORTS ON AGRICULTURE IN THE UNITED STATES.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, seeing that the information afforded by the Report of the Secretary of Legation at Washington includes various matters besides those connected with agriculture, and that it ranges over a period from 9th February to 3rd May 1880, he will take steps to secure in future the early and separate presentation to Parliament of information respecting agriculture as soon as received; whether he will endeavour to obtain from time to time from the Bureau of Agriculture at Washington, and place in the Library of this House, any Reports which may be issued by that department; and, further, if (to make such Reports of practical value) he will procure them as soon as possible after publication, and give such notice of their receipt as will make them readily available for consultation?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The time which elapsed in the publication of the Reports was owing partly to their containing a large quantity of statistical tables, and partly to a wish expressed by Mr. Drummond, the Secretary of Legation, to see and revise the text before they were published. Steps will be taken to insure as speedy publication as possible in future. I have also arranged that copies of the Reports of the Bureau of Agriculture at Washington shall be obtained and placed in the Library of the House immediately on their publication; but I do not exactly see what notice could be given of their having been placed there.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that as he could not obtain the information he required, he would, on going into Supply, move—

"That, in view of the increasing competition to which the farmers of the United Kingdom are exposed, it is the duty of the State to afford them early information with regard to probable agricultural imports; and that, in the opinion of this House, it is necessary that a Department of Agriculture should be forthwith formed at the Board of Trade; that such department should be charged with the special duty of obtaining agricultural statistics and reports from Foreign Countries, as well as from our Indian and Colonial Dependencies; and that such information should be regularly published from time to time, with the least possible delay."

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA AND YEOMANRY.

VISCOUNT EMLYN asked the Secretary of State for War, Why Adjutants of Militia are not allowed to participate in the permanent retirement granted to Adjutants of Volunteers by the Royal Warrant of the 29th of October 1879, considering that Adjutants of Militia and Volunteers, under the designation of Adjutants of Auxiliary Forces, have hitherto had the same permanent retirement, the last Royal Warrant in which both are included being dated as recently as the 6th of April 1878?

MR. CHILDERS: When I came to the War Office I found the question to which the noble Lord's inquiry refers under discussion, and we took it up without delay. It has now been decided, with the concurrence of the Treasury, that Adjutants of Militia and Yeomanry appointed before February, 1871, should have the same terms of retirement as Adjutants of Volunteers.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that buck shot, in addition to the ordinary ball cartridge, has been or is to be served out to the Royal Irish Constabulary; and, whether this new police ammunition has been adopted in view of threatened agrarian evictions in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER. Sir, I am informed on inquiry that a limited number of buckshot cartridges has been issued to the Constabulary in addition to ball cartridges. I see that the hon. Member has altered his Question. It was originally to ask if the new police ammunition has been adopted in view of "threatened agrarian disturbances in Ireland;" but he has now altered it to evictions. I must make this remark—that it is generally desirable to adhere to the terms of the Question put on the Paper. This issue of buckshot is not on account of agrarian disturbances or of evictions; but because it was the opinion of the authorities that if ever—and I most sincerely trust it will never occur in my time—it may unfortunately become necessary for the Police to fire, the risk of accidental injury to persons unconnected with the riots, by the use of long range bullets, might be avoided. The fact which mainly caused this issue was that it very unfortunately happened that at Lurgan, in a case where a riot occurred, some innocent persons were injured.

MR. PARNELL: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is not desirable that Questions should be altered after having been placed on the Paper. The reason I altered the Question is that it is my strong impression that I gave Notice of it as I have asked it; but I cannot be sure of that, as my Question was written under my directions, and not by myself.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ROMAN CATHOLICS IN MONTENEGRO.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information as to the alleged infractions of Article 27 of the Treaty of Berlin in the case of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Antuari, a district ceded to Montenegro by the above Treaty; that the said Roman Catholics have been ordered to send their children to a school taught by a Greek; that permission to open a church recently constructed has been withheld from them; and, if these allegations prove to be correct, will not Her Majesty's Government use its influence to obtain the fulfilment of the conditions upon which the said territory was ceded to Montenegro?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No information has reached Her Majesty's Government with regard to the alleged treatment of Roman Catholics in any of the districts ceded to Montenegro; but Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires will be instructed to report on the subject.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS AND HOSPITALS—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Vice President of the Council, If the Charity Commissioners have prepared, or have in course of preparation, a scheme for the government of Christ's Hospital under the Endowed Schools Acts 1869 and 1876; and, if he can state when that scheme will be presented for the consideration of the Governors in order that they may have a full and early opportunity of carrying out the recommendations made by the Royal Commission in 1877?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am informed by the Charity Commissioners that they have for some time past had a scheme in preparation, that it is now nearly ready, and will shortly be in the hands of the Governors and the public.

INSPECTORS OF FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS—TRADE SOCIETIES.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is any part of the duty of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops, or of the Assistant Inspectors acting under him, to report on and criticise the rules and the action of trade societies, as has been done on pp. 28 to 37 in the Report for 1879, when such rules and action do not in any way interfere with the administration of the Factories and Workshops Act; and, if it is no part of their duty, whether he will take steps to prevent the publication in future Reports of statements and opinions hostile to trade unions given by employers and others, to which statements and opinions the societies have no corresponding means of reply?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, it had always been the custom for the Inspectors of Factories to report upon the causes affecting the condition of trades, and in the discharge of that duty it was simply impossible altogether to avoid reference to the circumstances affecting the conduct both of employers and employed. If this were done with an evident prejudice on either side, it would obviously be very objectionable. As far as he had been able to judge from the Report referred to, that did not appear to have been the case. Whilst, on the one hand, the Report referred to the unfavourable effect of trade rules on the glass trade, the Report also reflected upon the injurious effects of the truck system. He should say that in those Reports, as far as possible, controversial matters should be avoided; but in the present case he saw no ground for imputing improper bias.

Mr. W. H. James

MERCANTILE MARINE—WRECKS AND CASUALTIES—OFFICIAL INQUIRIES.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has read a statement which was published by Mr. Samuel Plimsoll, lately a Member of this House, in the "Times" newspaper of the 17th inst. and which is in the terms following:—

"It should be widely known that, although in the five years ending with June last, 570 ships went to the bottom, each with every soul on board, only in eight cases was an inquiry instituted by the Board of Trade, although the men drowned numbered 6,469. In the last three years there were only three inquiries in 340 cases;"

whether these 570 ships were employed in trading from the United Kingdom; or whether they include fishing vessels, and also ships trading between Foreign Countries and British Colonies, but not trading to or from the United Kingdom; whether it is the fact that, during the last three years, only three official inquiries have been held in 340 cases of shipwrecks and other casualties; and, whether to remove all doubts, he will lay upon the Table of this House a statement showing the number of official inquiries of all sorts held into wrecks and casualties during the last seven years; and, whether he has any reason to believe that the officers in his Department whose duty it is to order inquiries, and select cases for inquiry, have failed in their duty owing to inefficiency, negligence, corruption, or otherwise.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have read the statement referred to. It is true that in the five years ending in June last, 570 British vessels were reported to the Board of Trade as missing, and that inquiries were instituted in eight of these cases only. It is also true that in the last three years 340 vessels were reported as missing, and that inquiries were instituted in three cases only. These vessels were not all simply employed in trading from the United Kingdom; they include fishing vessels, English and Colonial; they include Colonial vessels, and they include British vessels, English and Colonial, trading between ports out of the United Kingdom. The total number of judicial inquiries into shipwrecks of all kinds during the last three years has been 1,024. Full particulars of all such inquiries will be laid before the Committee on Merchant Shipping now sitting, and of the method of instituting them; and for this reason I do not think it necessary to lay the same particulars before the House at the present time. The officers of the Department did early in last year urge the institution of further inquiries into the losses of certain missing vessels; and the result shows that, notwithstanding the difficulties of holding an inquiry when all the eye witnesses have perished, inquiries can, in some cases, be held with much advantage. But I have no reason to believe that the officers in the Department, whose duty it is to order inquiries or select cases for inquiry, have failed in their duty owing to inefficiency, negligence, or corruption.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF SOLOMON NATHAN.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following circumstances:—On June 8th Solomon Nathan, a ticket of leave man, was convicted at the Surrey Sessions of stealing thirteen shillings and sevenpence from the person of Henry Moore, of Woodside, and that thereupon the convict was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude, with the addition of the unexpired two years on his ticket of leave, by Mr. Hardman, the chairman of the quarter sessions; and, if not, whether he will inquire into all the circumstances of the case?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had addressed an inquiry to the Chairman of the Surrey Sessions (Mr. Hardman), and his reply was to the effect that the convict had been previously convicted for felony in 1856, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment; 1858, three months; 1859, 12 months; 1860, six months; 1861, one month; 1863, six years' penal servitude; and 1871, 10 years' penal servitude and seven years' police supervision. The convict was well known as a thief, and was never known to earn his living honestly.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BEER DUTY.

MR. STORER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, under subsection 3 of Clause 33 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, only farmers whose house and farm lands not exceeding the annual value of £20 are to be exempt from duty on beer brewed at home; and, whether he will not allow all persons brewing solely for agricultural purposes a like exemption?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that with respect to the farmers, as with respect to all other persons, it was undoubtedly true that only farmers whose land, house, and farm lands were under the annual value of £20 were to be exempt from duty on beer brewed at home. He did not think it possible to allow a general exemption to all persons brewing solely for agricultural purposes. It would be impossible to grant an exemption for persons brewing for agricultural labourers without granting a similar exemption to persons brewing for manufacturing labourers.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— THE LAND BILLS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government can hold out any hope that they will give facilities for the consideration of the Settled Land Bill and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Bill in the present Session?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he would be glad to give facilities; but he did not see his way to giving any promise on the subject at present. He did not say that it would not be possible to give facilities before the end of the Session; but he could hold out no hope of doing so at an early date.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL.—POOR LAW UNIONS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any of the Poor Law Unions set forth in Schedule (D) of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, were not scheduled as distressed Unions by the Local Government Board prior to the 29th of February last; and, if so, whether he will name them; and, whether such Poor Law Unions will be entitled to all the other exceptional privileges accorded by the Legislature and Local Government Board to distressed Unions?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: All the Poor Law Unions scheduled in Schedule D of the Bill referred to by the noble Lord were scheduled before the 29th of February last. No distressed Union has been scheduled since that date.

CATTLE—IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.

MR. PAGET asked the Vice President of the Council, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in the "Times" of the 21st instant, with reference to gross cruelty said to have been practised on Foreign cattle landed at Birkenhead; and, if he will desire full inquiry to be made into the matter, and cause directions to be issued to the Veterinary Inspectors of the Privy Council to prosecute the offenders in all such cases?

MR. MUNDELLA: The attention of the Privy Council was called to the paragraph in The Times respecting the cruel treatment of foreign cattle, and the Veterinary Department immediately telegraphed to the Inspector of the Privy Council at Birkenhead for information. The Inspector reported on the facts; but as there had been a successful prosecution of the offender, the Privy Council considered it unnecessary to take any further steps. Whenever such a case is reported by the Inspectors of the Privy Council, a communication is made to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, who are willing to perform the valuable service of instituting a prosecution where there appears to be good grounds.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION—BOROUGH OF NORTHAMPTON.

MR. MAC IVER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, seeing that the Borough of Northampton contains a considerably smaller number of electors than the Borough of Birkenhead, which is represented by one Member only, the Government will consider the desirability of at once bringing in a short measure for the partial disfranchisement of Northampton, and for according an additional Member to Birkenhead? He wished to add that he had received a telegram stating that the population of Birkenhead, at the present moment, was between 90,000 and 95,000.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Government have no intention whatever of considering the subject.

NEWFOUNDLAND—MINING OPERATIONS.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the orders given to the Government of Newfoundland, in 1870 or 1871, to prevent the opening of mines on the east shore of the island are still in force; and, if so, whether, considering the advisability of encouraging the development of mining enterprises and other industries in our Colonies, he will take steps to have such order rescinded?

MR. GRANT DUFF: The Orders given in 1869, which modified certain Orders of 1866, are still in force. These Orders prohibit mining operations within half a mile of high-water mark in certain districts of Newfoundland, over the strand of which the French Government has ancient rights. Unless and until some final agreement about these rights shall have been come to, Her Majesty's present Advisers do not see their way to depart from the policy which has been pursued with reference to this matter by all their Predecessors for many years.

TURKEY AND GREECE—MILITARY FORCES.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have information that Ahmed Mukhtar Pacha has been appointed to the command of the Ottoman Forces in European Turkey; whether they are informed as to the amount of the Ottoman Force in Macedonia and the parts of Turkish territory adjoining; whether there is reason to believe that it amounts to 80,000 men or thereabouts; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the amount of military force at the disposal of the Greek Government?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government have no such information about Mukhtar Pasha. As far as we know, he is still Vali of the Vilayet of Monastir, and has the command of the troops in that district. We cannot state precisely what is the amount of the Ottoman Force in Macedonia and the adjoining territory; but we have no reason to believe that it amounts to anything like the number mentioned in the hon. Member's Question. Her Majesty's Government have confidential information with regard to the Military Forces of most of the European Powers; but it is of a kind which it would not be desirable to make public.

ARMY—MEDALS FOR THE CAPE FRONTIER WAR, 1877-8, AND THE ZULU WAR, 1879.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, seeing that the senior officers who took part in the Cape Frontier War of 1877-8, and in the Zulu War of 1879, have been rewarded for their services, he is able to announce that the Government will issue medals for the above-mentioned campaigns, as a means of recognizing the services of the junior officers, non-commissioned officers, and men; and, if so, how soon the issue may be expected?

MR. CHILDERS: In answer to the noble Lord, I have to say that conflicting opinions have been expressed as to the design for the medal for the South African campaigns; but this has now been settled, and the medals will be struck at once. Of the regiments concerned, those on Home service will be able to prepare their rolls of names in about three weeks; but a longer time will be necessarily required as regards corps abroad. The distribution will be made as fast as the names can be engraved on the medals after the rolls shall have been severally received and approved. I understand that the delay which has hitherto occurred in the issue of medals has caused great dissatisfaction; and I may state that a plan is now being considered by which, I hope, this delay will be greatly reduced.

FRANCE—FINANCIAL MEASURES.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will lay upon the Table, before the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill is considered in Committee, a statement of the Duties proposed to be levied under the financial measures now before the French Chambers, and showing their effect, either by way of increase or decrease, in the imposts on British products or manufactures; and also a statement of any proposals to grant or to continue bounties to any French trade or manufacture, to the prejudice of foreign competitors?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, by-and-by, when we come to the Orders of the Day, I shall have a word to say on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, which will bear materially on the inquiry now made by the right hon. Gentleman. I am afraid it would be impossible to comply literally with his request, or, indeed, to comply with it to the extent of laying the Returns on the Table of the House. It would not be a very convenient practice to lay upon the Table of this House Returns relating to the proceedings of foreign Chambers. There is one objection in this case—namely, that these proceedings are in progress: they are not in any fixed form, and are fluctuating and changing almost from day to day. Certain duties have been fixed by the French Chamber; but they are now in the course of modification in the French Senate. The Foreign Office are in the habit of making known, as far as they are able, to parties interested what is going on in the French Legislature. I think, therefore, under the circumstances, it would be better that reference should be made to the Foreign Office, who will at all times be most willing to communicate the information, rather than that we should mislead the House by laying on the Table information which would appear to have the character of being permanent when, in fact, it is not so.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—THE REPORT.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Report of the Irish Local Government Board for the year ending 31st March, 1880, will be published; and, whether in that or in some other way he will place before the House such information as to the numbers in receipt of in-door and out-door relief, and the total amount and poundage of the rates levied in the several Irish Unions, as would show the condition of the country in this respect during that year, and up to the latest possible date, as compared with preceding years?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am very anxious, Sir, that the Report of the Local Government Board should be in the hands of Members as soon as possible; and, knowing that the Report itself is written, I made inquiries as to why it was not presented. I found it was usual to have an Appendix, which is not yet ready. I thought it better, this time, not to wait for an Appendix. The Report contains most of the information required by the right hon. Gentleman, and he will be able to find the rest, I think, in the Appendix. If not—and if he will let me know what more he wants in the Appendix—I shall be glad to communicate with him.

M O T I O N S .

MR. BRADLAUGH.—RESOLUTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question to the Prime Minister with reference to what took place yesterday. I wish to ask, Whether the Government intend to make or submit to the House any Motion; and, if so, what the Motion may be, with respect to the case of Mr. Bradlaugh?

MR. GLADSTONE: Down to the present moment—that is to say, within the 24 or 26 hours which have elapsed since Mr. Bradlaugh was committed—I have not felt it my duty to bring the matter under the consideration of my Colleagues; and I have not any advice to tender to the House on the subject.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Under these circumstances, Sir, and having regard to the fact that the Motion for the committal of Mr. Bradlaugh was made by myself, I have thought I should do well to submit to the House a proposal upon this subject. I wish to say in a few words what was the meaning of the Motion which I made yesterday. It was not made in a vindictive spirit; but it was made for the double purpose of asserting the authority of the House and of maintaining the order of its proceedings. The authority of the House had been questioned by Mr. Bradlaugh, who denied that it was legally competent for the House to do that which it had been pleased to do, and the order of its proceedings was jeopardized by the entry and re-entry of that Gentleman after he had been removed from the House. It seemed to me necessary to immediately assert the authority of the House, and to maintain its order by the Motion which I made, and which the House accepted. That object has been accomplished; and I do not think it is necessary for us to prolong the custody of Mr. Bradlaugh, seeing that these objects have been effected. I cannot say what may take place in the future; but I can hardly assume that Mr. Bradlaugh, after having raised the question which he desired to raise, and raised it in a form which was perfectly clear and distinct, would again take any steps which would put the House to inconvenience. If he should do so, of course the House will know how to deal with the case. The Motion which I wish to submit is this—

“That this House, having committed Mr. Bradlaugh to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms on account of his disobedience of the Orders of the House, and of his resistance to its authority, and having thereby supported its Order and asserted its authority, Mr. Bradlaugh be discharged from the custody of the Serjeant at Arms.”

MR. LABOUCHERE: Mr. Speaker, I think it only right, in order that there may be no misconception on the matter, to say that I understand from Mr. Bradlaugh that should he be released under these conditions he will at once return to the House, and do what the Prime Minister, the Colleagues of the Prime Minister, the present Attorney General, and the late Attorney General say that he has an absolute legal right to do. I am not going further to interfere in this debate—if there be a debate—or to dispute the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman has just made. But I think it well that I should state to the House what will occur. I have thought that it was due to the House, and it is also due to Mr. Bradlaugh, to state this, in order that there may be no supposition that there is any understanding on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh that he will not do that which he claims he has an absolutely legal right to do, and which it is his duty to do.

MR. GORST: After what we have just heard I think we ought to have some statement from the Leader of the House. The sitting Member for Northampton has told us that in the event of Mr. Bradlaugh being released from custody he will come forward and pursue a what is the best way of meeting the views of Parliament and of the trade. But then the proposal is open to this objection—that we can obtain no positive assurance from the French Government. The proceedings of that Government may be much delayed and may lead to too long a period of uncertainty in the trade, to the great disadvantage of those engaged in that trade, as well as to the consumers of the country and the Revenue. I had some hope that I might have been able to collect the judgment of Parliament with regard to the Wine Duties in a definitive form, and yet to have been able to proceed with the French Government so as to settle the whole matter after a very short postponement, and I named the 15th of August. I am, however, sorry to say that I can hardly now entertain that hope. I do not think we shall be able to conclude an arrangement with the French Government or any other Government on the subject of the Wine Duties on such conditions as to take effect before the 15th of August. I am very unwilling to ask the House to prolong that term, because the prolongation tends to uncertainty and partial paralysis in the Revenue. I think, in the circumstances, that the most convenient course to adopt is to invite and welcome discussion in this House, as I have welcomed free communication from the trade. There is very general advantage in our obtaining the best information as to the proper mode of proceeding when we come to reduce the Wine Duties; and I shall not grudge having submitted this proposal to the House if I am able to gather such authority and information on the subject that the Government shall feel itself in the condition, in dealing with France, that they are proceeding on safe ground. I have no doubt that there is in this House, as there is in this country, a difference of opinion upon an important question connected with the structure of the wine tariff. I have submitted to the House that course which I believed to be decidedly the best, the most calculated to promote the freedom of trade, and the most conducive to the ultimate convenience and advantage of the trader. But transitions in trade are rarely agreeable to those they immediately affect, and no doubt I must make two admissions. In the first place, there are some arguments to be urged in favour of a different mode of constructing the tariff; and, in the second place, we must look in this matter not exclusively to abstract arguments but to the convenience of all parties, and to the sense and opinion they entertain about their own convenience. The two modes of proceeding to which I referred are these. By one of them the tariff was constructed principally in the manner given in the Bill—that is, by a duty varying with each degree of alcoholic strength of the wine; and the other would be by what I should call a tariff of steps, not varying with each degree of strength of wine, but constructed more like the tariff of 1860 as it originally appeared, when we had three or four different rates of duty, and wines were divided into classes with steps in the duty. I shall, before the time for going into Committee on the Bill, endeavour to arrive at the best judgment in our power as to the choice between those two methods of proceeding. I find there is a great difference of opinion among the trade on the subject; but I shall regard it as being my duty to put an end to all uncertainty in the matter at a very early date. I have scarcely any expectation now of being able to conclude the matter by the 15th of August; and unless, in the course of a week or 10 days, I find reason to change that opinion, I shall not ask the House to enact at present the alterations I have suggested, but rather look to the course which I have now indicated as one which would probably be preferred by the French Government—that is to say, that we should negotiate in the autumn, that we should then arrive at a conclusion which we might present to Parliament, say, in the month of January, without any prolonged agitation or uncertainty. But it is quite evident that if I am to look forward to that mode of proceeding, it is very desirable that I should be well acquainted with the opinions both of Gentlemen of authority who sit in this House and of members of the trade, in order that in our arrangements with France and other countries we may not run the risk of going wide of the general expectation and views that may be entertained by the most competent judges. Some advantage will be derived by the Revenue from the postponement for four or five months of this change in the Wine

this subject, which I say has been discussed already usque ad nauseam, I feel it my duty to say that this subject has been inflamed, and that controversy has been provoked on it in the sacred name of religion, but really for selfish and purely Party purposes. I was one of those who took particular pleasure in the united action of the Leaders on both sides at the very first stage of this controversy; but I have not been able to ascertain why the Leaders parted company in dealing with this delicate question subsequently, and why Gentlemen—I will not say of no responsibility, but from their position in the House of no official responsibility in either Party—were allowed to engage in the treatment of this question in such a manner that we have already lost several days. We have waited for the deliberations of two Select Committees; and I undertake to say that, as far as a conscientious assent to any given proposition on the subject is concerned, we are just as much disunited as we were on the very first day that we rejected Mr. Bradlaugh's claim to make an Affirmation. Now, I rise simply for the purpose of imploring hon. Members who have influence in the House of Commons not to do anything that will continue a controversy which must be scandalous, and which must reflect seriously on the dignity and character of this Assembly. With some of Mr. Bradlaugh's political opinions I sympathize. I sympathize with him because I know he has been friendly to my country. But his friendship for Ireland would never influence me a hair's breadth in straining the law to admit him to this House; neither would I be influenced a hair's breadth to obstruct his admission to this House. I, therefore, was one of those Members who looked to the two Select Committees, in the appointment of which I assisted, to enable me to give a rational decision on this delicate question. I am sorry to say that, as the Committees have contradicted one another, I have derived no assistance whatever from their deliberations. I declined, therefore, to accept the responsibility of voting one way or the other on the vital question which was brought to a decision on Tuesday evening last, and on the equally important question of the imprisonment of Mr. Bradlaugh which was submitted yesterday. But now we have reached this stage—that the Leader of the Opposition, whom certainly I cannot congratulate on any attempt he may have made to suppress heated feelings in reference to this matter—on the contrary, I deplore the efforts which have been made, notably on this (the Opposition) side of the House, to make this ugly and disagreeable question as ugly and disagreeable as possible—now that a Motion has been placed before the House, which is another temptation thrown in our path, I appeal to hon. Gentlemen who respect the sanctity of the principles which have been invoked in this controversy not to drag the House of Commons again into the questions which have been submitted to our consideration. I protest, as a Christian man, against the House being made an advertising medium for any politician who may wish to affect a superior interest in religion, which he has no right to claim over me or any other Member, or an advertising medium for Mr. Bradlaugh and his friends, as it would unquestionably if this controversy were needlessly protracted. Should Mr. Bradlaugh again present himself at the Bar of the House I need hardly say I am not competent to offer him or his friends advice; but I trust that if he be liberated by the Resolution of the House he will not adopt any such course. I venture to say so because I think it would be a futile course. If this House, by Resolution, has the right legally to imprison Mr. Bradlaugh for disobeying its orders it can also adopt a milder course of punishment, and can instruct its officers at the door to prevent his admission. I am of opinion that no word or act of Mr. Bradlaugh has, in the slightest degree, affected his original title to sit as a Member of this Assembly. That title is unimpaired; and if he is not satisfied with the decision of the House of Commons—as we know he is not—then his rational, straightforward, and obvious course is to appeal against the decision of the House of Commons to the Courts of Law outside, from which, by his own acknowledgment, he has never failed in obtaining justice. If this course is adopted by him and supported by his friends we shall be relieved from a repetition of the very unpleasant scenes we have witnessed from the beginning; and I appeal to influential Members on both sides of the House to accept, without a protracted discussion, the Motion

mit we are not entitled to make any such addition to the Revenue as they presume we should be making by levying on the same quantity of material a very considerably higher tax, while we profess to be levying a tax which it is worth their while to pay in consideration of their relief from the Malt Duty and its accompaniments—the only exception to that being that the turn in cases of this kind is very properly given in favour of the Revenue. There are various points on which I desire it to be known we do intend to make certain concessions to the brewery trade, because they have satisfied us a larger produce will be obtained from a quarter of malt than we had, with our former information, felt justified in reckoning. Something in the direction demanded by the brewers may be freely accorded by the Government, and without any fear of damaging the computations of Revenue we have heretofore laid before the House. The technical form that the change will take will be an augmentation of the figure indicated in the Resolutions and the Bill, for the measure of fermenting liquid when it is in the fermenting vats or squares. As to the degree at which the specific gravity should be taken I wish to withhold judgment; but the view with which we shall pursue our inquiries will be to fulfil in spirit the assurances given to the House when the Resolutions were originally submitted to it, and to observe the general rules of equity towards the trade. Besides some augmentation in the figure which we are going to adopt as the standard of specific gravity, there is another important head upon which we are also going to make an important concession to the trade. The Bill, as it originally stood, provided that an allowance should be made to the brewer as regarded the contents of his fermenting squares of a maximum of 4 per cent for waste—that is to say, for a positive diminution of the liquor before it became a merchantable article. Now, no doubt the waste in a brewing establishment will justify, and even in equity require, the enlargement of that allowance; and instead of making an allowance limited to the maximum of 4 per cent we are disposed to make a uniform allowance, and we shall probably fix that allowance as high as 6 per cent. The third alteration is consequent on those changes, and it involves so much of a technical character, and has reference so much to the exceedingly varying position of the brewing process in the different breweries of the country, that I will not enter into details, and will only say there should be augmentation in the limit of variation allowed on what is called the presumptive charge, or the charge upon the materials used in brewing. There is a fourth point, which is simple in its character. The Bill, as it stands, leaves it in the power of the Government to determine at what period the duty on brewing shall become payable after the charge has been taken, subject to the limitation, “not less than 14 days or more than a month.” We propose to strike out the reference to the 14 days altogether, and the mode adopted will be that of monthly payments after monthly charges. The present system of the Inland Revenue is to divide the year into periods of six weeks. In lieu of that, it will now be divided into periods of one month. The liquor will be tested in the fermenting squares in the course of each successive month, and the Revenue will be collected on the beer so tested from month to month. These are the points on which I think it will be necessary to make modifications. That is the principal framework of the plan. There have been other questions raised upon which discretion may be reserved both to the Government and the House. There is, for example, the question of the limit of exemption, which the brewers think is too high, but which others hold is not carried far enough, either generally or with regard to some particular class. One particular point has been raised by the brewing trade on which we think their demand is obviously fair. Occasionally it happens that a number of families may club together to brew in a brewhouse, each living in a house below £20, and the brewhouse itself being rated below £20. There might come in very serious evasions of the duty, and a sort of brewing clubs might be established practically exempt from duty. That would be contrary to equity, and it may be easily met by inserting in the exemption clause that brewing which is to take place by virtue of that exemption must be brewing upon the premises. If, as is probable, we are compelled to postpone for some months

MR. J. R. YORKE desired, in conformity with what he believed was the general wish of the House, to withdraw the Amendment.

PARLIAMENT—WALLINGFORD AND BUTE—NEW WRITS.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR moved the issue of a new Writ for the borough of Wallingford, for the election of a Member in lieu of Mr. Walter Wren, whose election had been declared to be void.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not intend to persevere in his Notice of opposition, because he thought that since it was determined that the Writ should be issued an opposition on his part could not be successful; but he felt that this was one of those boroughs the population of which was so small that it did not afford a sufficient basis for representation in the House. His conscience rebelled against their being in such a hurry to issue the Writ, when the Judges had found that 12 persons had been guilty of bribery and corruption; and if the Judges did not report on this and other cases that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, it must be borne in mind that they confined themselves to the evidence brought before them by the parties, and did not embark upon inquiries of an inquisitorial character.

Motion agreed to.

NEW WRIT FOR BUTESHIRE, — in the room of Thomas Russell, esquire, who, having held a Contract entered into for the Public Service at the time of his Election for the said Shire, was incapable of being elected for the same.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL—[BILL 221.]

(Mr. Playfair, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: I, of course, do not intend to go back upon any discussion of general principles, though Members who feel it their duty to discuss general principles may find this an opportunity for doing so. But there are two important practical matters on which it is necessary for me to make some observations to the House—they are the alterations proposed by the Budget in respect to the Wine Duties and the Malt Duty. With respect to the Wine Duties, the Government were desirous to give the House the first intimation of their intentions. Overtures which had been made to them from the French Government had led them to entertain the hope that the French Government might be in a position to proceed with negotiations at such a speed as to enable us to settle the law after a short interval, and, therefore, without any violent disturbance of the wine trade. The House is aware of the connection between the Wine Duties and the subject of Commercial Treaties, for the conclusion of which great anxiety is felt among the commercial and the trading classes of this country. Where that connection subsists there are two modes of proceeding, and each of these modes is open to its own particular objections. You may proceed, in the first place, to negotiate with the foreign country, in which case you have to fix all the particulars of your arrangement before that arrangement comes to the knowledge or within the jurisdiction of Parliament. That was the mode in which the French Treaty was concluded in 1860. It has the advantage of presenting the subject to the House in a form in which the House knows exactly the question that is before it, and can judge whether it shall or shall not accept the arrangement. But it has the disadvantage that the House is tied up practically to some affirmative or negative, and cannot exercise a judgment upon the details and forms of the arrangement. The other mode is that which we have adopted on the present occasion. We have submitted our arrangement in detail, and it is perfectly within the power of the House to indicate its preference for this or that form of the arrangement, presuming it well inclined to the general principle, and with the advantage of being enabled to know in what manner we ought to proceed, and

mit we are not entitled to make any such addition to the Revenue as they presume we should be making by levying on the same quantity of material a very considerably higher tax, while we profess to be levying a tax which it is worth their while to pay in consideration of their relief from the Malt Duty and its accompaniments—the only exception to that being that the turn in cases of this kind is very properly given in favour of the Revenue. There are various points on which I desire it to be known we do intend to make certain concessions to the brewery trade, because they have satisfied us a larger produce will be obtained from a quarter of malt than we had, with our former information, felt justified in reckoning. Something in the direction demanded by the brewers may be freely accorded by the Government, and without any fear of damaging the computations of Revenue we have heretofore laid before the House. The technical form that the change will take will be an augmentation of the figure indicated in the Resolutions and the Bill, for the measure of fermenting liquid when it is in the fermenting vats or squares. As to the degree at which the specific gravity should be taken I wish to withhold judgment; but the view with which we shall pursue our inquiries will be to fulfil in spirit the assurances given to the House when the Resolutions were originally submitted to it, and to observe the general rules of equity towards the trade. Besides some augmentation in the figure which we are going to adopt as the standard of specific gravity, there is another important head upon which we are also going to make an important concession to the trade. The Bill, as it originally stood, provided that an allowance should be made to the brewer as regarded the contents of his fermenting squares of a maximum of 4 per cent for waste—that is to say, for a positive diminution of the liquor before it became a merchantable article. These are the points on which I think it will be necessary to make modifications. That is the principal framework of the plan. There have been other questions raised upon which discretion may be reserved both to the Government and the House. There is, for example, the question of the limit of exemption, which the brewers think is too high, but which others hold is not carried far enough, either generally or with regard to some particular class. One particular point has been raised by the brewing trade on which we think their demand is obviously fair. Occasionally it happens that a number of families may club together to brew in a brewhouse, each living in a house below £20, and the brewhouse itself being rated below £20. Duties. It will make an addition to the surplus of £130,000 or £140,000; but, of course, I do not think any change ought to take place in the proposals on that ground. Another subject on which I should wish to say a word is that of the Malt and Beer Duties. The operation which we have to effect is one in which we are aided, I think I may say, by the general approval throughout the country of the substance of the plan, but in its details it is the most difficult with which, in a long experience, I have ever had to deal, because we are not imposing a new duty—in which case parties submit to the authority of Parliament, and the question must be judged by general policy and not by close reference to an actual and fixed standard—but we are rather commuting an old duty, and commuting it into a duty which is to be placed on a new article in the commercial sense, though it is an article representing a more advanced stage of progress towards consumption than the article on which the duty was originally laid. The problem, therefore, which is submitted to us is to determine what is the substantial equivalent in reference to the Revenue of the Malt Duty which has hitherto been levied. The determination of that question is a matter of the extremest nicety. That depends upon a number of matters with regard to which the representatives of the Government and the officers of the Revenue—even the most practical and ablest of them—stand at a considerable disadvantage in their dealings with members of great trades. Members of great trades have a knowledge far more close than any of even the best officers of the Revenue could possess, and their opinions must carry a certain weight. They, of course, are justified in making the most of those opinions in reference to their own interests. But, at the same time, on the other hand, as regards the public Revenue, they have no responsibility whatever; and if it should happen that they present the most plausible representations, which the Government cannot actually at the time confute, but which afterwards entirely break down, the public Revenue has, and can have, no possible reparation or remedy. In this particular instance, we have to see what are the exact relations between two articles, and to ascertain the proportions of the sums levied on malt and upon beer is a question of the greatest complexity and nicety. But it was far more complex than it need have been but for the mode hitherto in use for levying this great branch of the Revenue; for, practically, the duty, as a rule, has been charged, not upon a certain quantity of malt obtained from the grain, but by a charge laid on the grain before it is made into malt, so that the question of the yield of grain into malt is further complicated by a consideration of the yield of malt into beer. The question is one which the most able officers have been engaged in examining; but I am not as yet able to announce that we have arrived with regard to it at any absolute or final conclusion. The highly intelligent and opulent members of the trades connected with brewing and malting, especially brewing, contend that the result of our proposals will be more favourable than we have estimated, and until we have got to the bottom of that question I have not felt myself justified in shutting the door against further investigation, and therefore I do not now state the details which may come up in Committee. As regards the general position of the proposals, taking them altogether there will be no great difference from that originally announced. I have presented, at the request of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, figures showing as nearly as I can the effect of the change for the present year as connected with the amount of drawback, and I have not the least idea that anything will occur to alter, to any appreciable extent, the figures so presented. In regard to the ultimate results of the change, I would rather reserve my opinion till we have completed our communications with members of the brewing trade. As I estimated the change, it will be in favour of the public, and with an outlay of £1,100,000 we shall obtain, after defraying some temporary charges, between £300,000 and £400,000 a-year solid Revenue, perfectly unexceptionable in its character, and which is due from laying the duty on a manufactured article instead of upon raw material. The brewing trade represented to us that we should make a much larger sum of money than we supposed, and it is with the view of testing that operation that I wish to reserve an—on details; because I ad-

If, as is probable, we are compelled to postpone for some months

the change in the Wine Duties, the effect will be to make a certain change to our credit. The figures I have presented this morning are somewhat less favourable for the Revenue than those I presented on the first day. They are £50,000 or £60,000 less favourable. The general upshot is, that the surplus for which I propose to ask the House will probably be somewhat larger than the point at which I stated it, but not so much more that the House will be likely to grudge it, or to entail the necessity of any change in our proposals. It may be that other changes of a minute character may take place when the measure is passed through Parliament in some way affecting the calculations. But the House, on the whole, may understand that we are asking them to vote in this financial change upon what may be comprehended under the four following heads:—First, the imposition of 1*d.* in the Income Tax; secondly, the imposition of an additional charge on licences. With respect to this, by the way, I may say that no observations have been made to me of a nature to lead me to suppose that we shall have to make any material change in the proposals submitted. The third great point was the Wine Duties, and I do not at all abate my hopes of carrying it out as originally proposed; but some delay is necessary. The fourth and last point is that of the Malt Duty. On the whole, considering the scheme as a financial scheme, and with reference to the surplus, I can present it to the House with more confidence than I did before, as a scheme which is safe and moderate for your adoption, and under which we shall have a surplus Revenue available for meeting any demands, if they should arise, of something between £400,000 and £500,000 for the service of the present year.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. ANDERSON rose to move, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, seeing Beer is already exempted from four-fifths of the proper tax upon its alcohol, and the new proposals are expected even further to cheapen it, any loss caused to the Revenue by the abolition of the Duty on Malt should be made good by the Beer Tax, and not by the Income Tax."

Mr. Gladstone

The hon. Member said, he had listened with great attention to the statement of the Prime Minister. That part of it which related to the Wine Duties did not in any way affect the arguments he desired to present; but that part relating to the Beer Duty did. He confessed he did not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should be so painfully desirous of arriving at absolute exactness in regard to the commutation of the duty from malt to beer. The right hon. Gentleman argued as if the Beer Tax was to be a tax levied on the brewer, and as if what he had to do was to watch over the interests of the brewers. But the tax was not a tax upon the brewers. It was in no sense that; but it was a tax on the consumers of beer, who were, perhaps, the most numerous class of persons in this country. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman ought not to require in any way to be so very conscientious about the exactness of the commutations. All he had to take care of was that his calculations should be such that the Revenue should sustain no loss by the commutation. For his part, he was very pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that there were grounds to suppose he would get a larger sum out of the Beer Tax than he originally computed. The right hon. Gentleman's scheme would be greatly improved by that. That was an amendment in the direction in which he wished to move, and he did not approve of what the right hon. Gentleman had said about making further concessions to the brewers in order to do away with that improvement which he had announced in his speech. He (Mr. Anderson) approved entirely of the abolition of the Malt Tax and its conversion into Beer Duty. There was no novelty in the proposal itself, which had been suggested in that House over and over again. The real novelty consisted in the courage of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in giving practical effect to the suggestion. For that splendid stroke of financial policy the House owed its thanks to the right hon. Gentleman, because it removed the tax on alcohol entirely out of the domain of farmers' grievances, and left to future Chancellors of the Exchequer a power of expansion and contraction of the Revenue such as they had never had before. Wishing to illustrate the facility of contraction or expansion of the Revenue afforded by the tax on beer, he would propose, when the Bill came into Committee, an increase of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per gallon on beer. That small tax, which would be absolutely unfelt by consumers of beer, would bring into the Exchequer £1,750,000 or £2,000,000. A financial scheme which put it into the power of future Chancellors of the Exchequer, in case of emergency—such as war—to raise that sum by charging an extra $\frac{1}{2}$ d. duty on every gallon of beer, was a splendid piece of finance, and he cordially approved of it so far; but what he did not approve of was the discrepancy that existed between the tax on different descriptions or dilutions of alcohol. They had to deal with three countries, each drinking a very considerable quantity of alcohol. The Scotch and Irish took their alcohol diluted with, say, about 50 per cent of water, which brought it into the condition of proof spirit. The English beer drinkers, however, had their alcohol diluted with about 95 per cent of water, hops, and less harmless ingredients; and because it was so the Englishman was allowed to get his alcohol at a totally different calculation, and that was the injustice that he complained of, which was being continued now. He supposed that the right hon. Gentleman's reply was that he did not by his Bill create injustice; but that was not a sufficient answer. It was quite true that he did not create it by the Bill; but the moment he proceeded to deal with this question, he must have found that flagrant injustice staring him in the face, and could not avoid seeing that the drinker of alcohol in Scotland or Ireland was taxed at the rate of 10s. per gallon proof spirits, while the drinker of alcohol in England was only being taxed at the rate of 20d. per gallon. He hoped some good reason would be given for that discrepancy before it passed through the House. The Prime Minister would be bound to do something with it, and however small a step was taken, the undoing of an injustice would be satisfactory to Scotland and Ireland. They did not expect it all at once, after an injustice had lasted for years. They knew they could not have it abolished by one step; but when the time came—and both Scotland and Ireland had been looking forward to it for years—for the abolition of the Malt

Tax, and the changing of that tax into a duty on beer, they hoped there would be a time when some step would be taken to redress the grievances of Scotland and Ireland respecting the matter. Therefore, he blamed the Prime Minister for not making some statement with regard to it. The proposal of the Prime Minister was to continue that injustice to the fullest extent; and he was not even sure that the Prime Minister was not somewhat adding to that injustice, because a change was being made to the advantage of the beer drinkers in England that would cost £1,100,000, and that was proposed to be made by an Income Tax levied all over; so that the payers of the Income Tax, who were a small section of the community compared with the drinkers of beer in Scotland and Ireland, would pay equally with Englishmen for the benefit that was being done to England alone by the change on duty. It was no answer to say that the Scotch beer drinker paid for the alcohol in his beer at the same rate as the English drinker; nor was it any answer to say that the English spirit drinker paid for the alcohol in those spirits at the same rate as the Irish or the Scotch for their whisky. That was no reply. They had to deal with national habits, and it could not be pretended that the discrepancy was continued for the purpose of making the Irish and Scotch people sober. It had had no effect in making them take to beer instead of whisky hitherto. The Irish and Scotch had continued unmurmuringly to pay that high tax on spirits; and he firmly believed that if the tax on beer was added to by $\frac{1}{2}$ d., the English taxpayer would bear it, even if he murmured at it. It would be no more unjust to disregard his murmurs than it had been to disregard the murmurs of Ireland and Scotland for years past. That was not a new question, for Scotchmen and Irishmen had been speaking of it frequently; and if the Prime Minister had been asked during the last six years—as he hoped he would be during the next six years—he would have had opportunities again and again of hearing the grievances brought up, and of hearing that Scotchmen and Irishmen did look forward to a time when something would be done towards redressing them. He did not think it was necessary for him to go into the argument of the Prime Minister with respect to his expectation of cheapening beer by the new change he had instituted, and he did not know it was necessary for him to show that there was that great discrepancy in the alcohol in beer and the alcohol in proof spirits. On that point, perhaps, he ought to make himself quite clear. In his speeches the right hon. Gentleman had always spoken of proof spirit, and not of alcohol. The two things were quite different. Proof spirit meant alcohol already diluted, containing only about 50 per cent of alcohol. He had said that beer contained about 10½ degrees. That did not mean 10 degrees of alcohol; it meant 10 degrees of proof spirit, or about 5 degrees of alcohol, and the duty would be only about 1s. 8d., as against the 10s. duty on spirits. He had said quite enough to prove there was an enormous discrepancy. In his Resolution he had called in four-fifths; but it was really more than that, because more than five times the duty was paid. There was one other point that, perhaps, he ought to touch upon, and that was the amount of change there would be by increasing the duty on beer over that of wine. The duty upon wine the Prime Minister proposed at 6d. per 20 degrees; and, therefore, unless beer paid 3d. per gallon of duty, it would not come up to the low duty for wine. But he wished to propose 2½d. per gallon, which was going half way between the two, and then it would be considerably cheaper than the charge on the foreign spirit imported in the low wine. When he proposed to increase the tax by ½d., he confessed he did so as a step towards the equalization of the question, and to do that it would be necessary to raise the tax to 9s. a barrel, and it would then be level with the 6d. for the 20 degrees of wine. Therefore, in the event of some future Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Prime Minister himself, in pursuance of justice to Scotland or Ireland, or in the emergency of a war, finding it necessary to impose a larger duty than 3d., it would be necessary, with a view to a Treaty with a foreign nation, to introduce a saving clause to the effect that if it was found necessary to raise the duty on beer until it became as high as the duty on wine, it should be no violation of the Treaty. At present there were no other points that he wished to raise, although there were some other points he should have liked to have discussed; but as they would interfere with the Amendment he wished to put before the House, he would reserve them for consideration in Committee. With those observations he would move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, seeing Beer is already exempted from four-fifths of the proper tax upon its alcohol, and the new proposals are expected even further to cheapen it, any loss caused to the Revenue by the abolition of the Duty on Malt should be made good by the Beer Tax and not by the Income Tax,"—(Mr. Anderson.)

—instead thereof.

MR. R. N. FOWLER, after inquiring about the deductions of Income Tax in July, said, he wished to make a general observation with regard to the Budget which the right hon. Gentleman had brought in. The proposal to take off the Malt Duty and place the tax on beer was very popular with many hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, and, among others, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who had urged it for a number of years. Those hon. Members who were most pleased with the proposal were county Members. It was not his own fortune to represent a county constituency in that House; and it seemed, from his point of view, to be rather hard that the Income Tax should be raised for the purpose of benefiting the constituents of the county Members. They had had in the past numerous complaints of the Income Tax; and at the close of his last Administration the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister had promised to abolish that impost altogether. To that effect he had put a scheme before the electors of Greenwich in 1874; and it was certainly rather startling that whilst the right hon. Gentleman's last proposal when in Office before was to remove the tax, his first act now should be a measure to increase it.

MR. BAXTER must say he was entirely satisfied with the Budget of his right hon. Friend. It might be very unpatriotic on his (Mr. Baxter's) part; but he could not get up any feeling of dissatisfaction, far less of indignation, at the fact that the national beverage of Scotland was taxed much more than beer. On the contrary, he should feel better pleased if more beer and more wine were consumed on the other side of the Tweed, and less of that old potent beverage, the excessive consumption of which was productive of so many evils in Scotland. He rejoiced very much at the consensus of opinion which seemed to prevail not only in that House, but all over the country, as to the wisdom of the Prime Minister in proposing to substitute a tax on beer for the tax on malt. According to the last speaker, there was nothing in the circumstances of the present time to justify the change; but the Leader of the House had clearly shown that this was the most favourable opportunity that had presented itself for years for making the change. Malt was, to all intents and purposes, a raw article, which it was against the first principles of political economy to tax at all; and he must confess that many times he had felt the force of the arguments addressed to the House by county Members sitting opposite against this tax, and how difficult it was to answer them. Besides, it would have been almost impossible under any circumstances, and however much the Government might be pressed for money, for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the Malt Tax; whereas the substituted duty afforded the Finance Minister of the day a source of Revenue which he could increase or decrease in accordance with the requirements of the country. On that account he heartily approved the leading feature of the Bill. But he rose chiefly to express his great satisfaction at the last, and to his mind the most important, clause of the Bill now before them—namely, that which empowered Her Majesty in Council to revise and reduce the Wine Duties. When his right hon. Friend spoke the other night he (Mr. Baxter) thought he was rather sanguine in fixing the 15th of August for this change, and he was not in the least surprised at the remarks which had fallen from him that evening. But to him (Mr. Baxter) it was a matter of small importance whether the clause stated August of this year or January or February of next. It was equally unimportant to the country. Although he was an out-and-out Free Trader—and he had said in that House before that he should like to go perhaps further than other Members of that House in the way of opening ports and abolishing Custom Houses and duties on many articles now taxed—he had never been able to sympathize at all with the objections made to Commercial Treaties; and he hailed with pleasure the prospect before them of new engagements, whether now or in the course of the autumn or winter, with France, Spain, and Portugal, because he felt satisfied that, if wisely arranged, they would be certain to give an important stimulus to British trade. They were told by certain people that those Treaties were altogether opposed to the principles of Free Trade. Surely the main object they ought to have in view ought to be the increase of trade between nations; and any expedient that would have that effect, in his opinion, ought to be welcomed by all practical men whatever theorists might say. Most of the objections to those Treaties, however, did not emanate from Free Traders, but from Gentlemen who were really, and had been during the whole of their past lives, Protectionists at heart. The statistics of English trade with France since 1860, showing an immense expansion of trade, scattered all those anti-Treaty theories to the winds. The English import of wine had increased nearly tenfold, while that of Spanish wines had almost doubled; and hon. Gentlemen knew what an enormous increase there had been from this country of manufactured goods. If they wanted encouragement to enter upon new negotiations as proposed by Government, it was to be found in the opposition of the Protectionists in France, and to their endeavours to stop the negotiations. He was told the other day, and, no doubt, some people thought, that this whole matter was thoroughly looked into and settled in 1860, but that was 20 years ago; and there ought to be no more finality in matters of finance and commerce than in politics, and the proposals of the Government showed a very clear and practical illustration of those matters. He wished to say that, in his opinion, they were all very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman opposite the late Chancellor of the Exchequer for having so promptly conceded a Committee on the Wine Duties last year, and also to his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright) for having presided over the deliberations of the Committee with great industry and ability. He had sat on many Committees, but had never been more interested in any inquiry, the absence of Party feeling and prejudice being most conspicuous throughout. He wanted to draw the attention of the House to three points which the evidence before the Committee clearly brought to his mind and the majority of those present. The first was that the country might set aside all apprehensions lest a material reduction of the Wine Duties should cause illicit distillation, and so injure the Revenue. The officers of the Customs Department treated that suspicion as a mere delusion, and the evidence of the gentlemen from the Inland Revenue Department was scarcely less emphatic. The second and most important point was this—that nearly all the witnesses declared that any material reduction of the Wine Duties must necessarily cause an enormous increase of importation and consumption of wine in this country. The fact which impressed itself most on his mind was that the wine trade of Great Britain was just in its infancy, and that, as compared with other countries, the consumption of wine in Great Britain was ludicrously small. They were told in evidence that the City of Paris consumed more wine in the course of a year than was consumed by the entire population of Great Britain and Ireland. Nearly all the Spanish, Portuguese, and French merchants connected with those trades, speaking from long practical experience, and great knowledge of the subject, stated that a revision and reduction of the Wine Duties would immensely increase the quantity and improve the quality of the wines imported to this country. Another point struck him forcibly, and that was the intense anxiety shown by many of our own Colonies—South Africa and Australia especially—to obtain such a reduction, so as to enable them to do a much larger business in Colonial wines; and one or two of the leading Spanish merchants told the Committee that, in their opinion, South Australia promised in the future to throw into the market the very best wines in the world. The fact was that the heavy duty on strong wines had operated injuriously on the wine trade of the Colonies. The third point, which was also clearly proved before the Committee, was that a large reduction on the duty on the wines of the Peninsular would, of necessity, in the very nature of things, bring about such a revision and reduction in the tariffs of Spain and Portugal as would enormously add to British trade all over the Peninsula. Our present Wine Duties were regarded as hostile to Spain and Portugal. Those countries tried to meet the duties by their tariffs, and the consequence was the British competition there had been almost entirely annihilated. The recommendations of the Committees in favour of a reduction in the Wine Duties was carried by large majorities, not, as was so often the case, by a majority of one, or the casting vote of the Chairman. The divisions were 9 to 6, 10 to 5, and in one instance 13 to 1, and the recommendations of the Committee, in substance and in spirit, were precisely the present proposals of the Government. He was very glad to hear what fell from the Prime Minister in regard to the scale of duties proposed to be levied, because he wished him to bear in mind that the great preponderance of evidence before the Committee was against a complicated sliding scale such as was proposed in the 4th Schedule of the Bill, and in favour of a uniform duty from 20 degrees up to 35. He was afraid the proposal of the Government in that respect would give rise to a great deal of unnecessary work and expense, and cause some delay and trouble. Indeed, in Spain and Portugal they were already complaining that there was another favour to France. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the question of bottled wines, and on this head see his way to alter his proposals. For his part, he was so pleased at the prospect of a reduction in the Wine Duties, and so satisfied that it would give an enormous stimulus to British trade, that he hoped the House would allow the Government to go with a free hand into the negotiations.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It had not been my intention, in any circumstances, to have entered into any very elaborate discussion of the general question; but after what we have heard this evening from the Prime Minister, I feel that I am less able to enter into such a discussion than I should otherwise have been. In several important respects we have not yet got the whole of the Government proposals in such a form as to admit of their being profitably discussed. That is the case, at least, as regards one important portion of the Wine Duties. And then as to the details of the transformation of the Malt Tax into a Beer Duty we have not sufficient information. There are, however, a few remarks which I wish to make. In the first place, I must say it struck me at the time Notice was given of a Supplementary Budget, and still more when the Budget was introduced, that it was not very easy to explain why we had a Supplementary Budget at that time at all. Undoubtedly the canons which the Prime Minister has repeatedly laid down with regard to the inconvenience of making more than one Financial Statement in the year would have led one to suppose that it would have been only in the case of some great and pressing necessity that he would depart from his own principles and make, at the present time, a Supplementary Financial Statement when the year was so young. Of course, circumstances might have arisen which would render such a Statement necessary. But having given my best consideration to the grounds alleged by right hon. Friend, I still think they were far from being sufficient. I do not think the first ground stated, when my right hon. Friend introduced the Supplementary Budget, was one which the House need take much notice of. He stated that the Estimates which I laid before the House were not very sanguine; that they were cautious, but not too cautious; and gave us to understand that I had not erred by want of care in framing them. At the same time, he did not state that there was a prospect of such a failure in the Estimates as would induce him at this time to make other proposals of additional taxation. He referred to the small amount of £200,000 of Supplementary Estimates which would have to be voted, and which would rather more than absorb the surplus I had in hand. That might or might not be the case. I think it is far too early in the year to say what the effect of the Supplementary Estimates might be. We know that every year there must be Supplementary Estimates, and that in a properly constituted Budget there will be savings of no inconsiderable amount. It is impossible to say where the savings will be; but in ordinary years the amount of savings under different heads will balance and cover the Supplementary Estimates. That, therefore, is not a ground upon which a new Budget involving considerable additional taxation ought to be proposed. But, no doubt, circumstances might have occurred which would render it necessary to provide additional funds for new and additional Services; and when my right hon. Friend referred to the possibility of some call upon us for India, he opened a consideration which might have justified a very important Financial Statement. But having done so, he proceeded to whittle away that ground, and to impress upon us that he had no proposals at that time to make, and that for some considerable time it would not be possible for the Government to bring forward such proposals. He made some observations, sound I think, on the desirableness of making such proposals in one form altogether, so as not to deal with a great question piece by piece. I think, under these circumstances, he would have acted more in accordance with the usual practice and the convenience of the House and the country, if he had waited until he was in a position to make proposals with regard to giving relief to India, and to providing the Ways and Means which might be called for. His object was to make provision for possible calls, without knowing himself that they will ever be made. The financial result of his proposal, as well as the amount he proposed to provide, is so small as rather to preclude the possibility of his making any large assistance to Indian finance unless in the way of some loan raised and the interest upon it. We may therefore, I think, set aside these as considerations which could hardly weigh with us in considering the propriety of bringing in a new Budget at this time. There was another reason which the Prime Minister put forward and laid considerable stress upon. He told us that the French Commercial Treaty was coming to a close; that within a short time it would be necessary to have a new Treaty, unless we were to lose the advantages which the Treaty of 1860 had conferred on our trade; and that, in order to successfully carry on the negotiations which Her Majesty's Government were opening with France, it would be necessary to make some proposals with regard to the Wine Duties; and, therefore, he took the opportunity of asking what certainly is very unusual—that we should give the Government power, by Order in Council, to propose and carry through a particular set of propositions with regard to the alterations in the Wine Duties. At the time it struck me that that was a strange proposal to make—and one in connection with which I have very much doubt as to whether it is likely to conduce to a satisfactory conduct of negotiations with a foreign country. It certainly seemed to me that, before the basis of the negotiations had been laid, a proposal of that kind, and the putting into your Act of Parliament a provision that the whole thing must be settled by a particular day, and that a very short day, was not likely to conduce to a settlement; and what we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman to-night confirms my impression. But, leaving that aside for the moment, we have to consider, not only the alterations in the Wine Duties with France, but what effect they will have on other countries—Spain, Portugal, Italy—whose wines are of greater strength; and we have heard nothing to explain to us with what probability we shall consult the interests of this country in negotiating with these foreign countries by laying down in an act of Parliament a scale that would be applicable to the wines of those countries. So far as I am aware, the scale that is proposed in the Bill is not very likely to give satisfaction to some of those wine-growing countries; and I really do not know in what position we may be to arrange our tariffs with them if we are to be bound by a scale such as this, without knowing how it will be looked at by those Powers. We have to accomplish a most difficult task—to arrange a scale to give satisfaction to several countries, all of them jealous about the scale, and as to its being an equivalent of something to be given on the other side. I do not desire to lay down any strict principle of political economy on the subject of Tariff Treaties. I am not at all indisposed to make Commercial Treaties, and endeavour to obtain advantages in consideration of advantages given to other countries. But I am quite sure, if you enter on that system, if you are to carry it throughout your commercial policy, as matters now stand, you will find yourselves embarked in a most difficult and complicated task, because the “most favoured nation” clause will oblige you to give to several countries unconditionally what you obtain from others in return for equivalent concessions. Now, we are told all this is laid aside for the present. I am not sorry to hear it. The right hon. Gentleman tells us to wait a short time, when he promises us further information. In the meantime, I am quite ready to say this—that it will be of great advantage, now we have these proposals before us, that those who have practical information on the subject should give us the benefit of it. I do not enter into the question myself, feeling that I do not speak with authority upon it; but I do feel great hesitation in accepting the system of a rise of duty by so much per degree. I remember that when the alcoholic scale was first introduced there were two breaks instead of one. There was a break at 18°, and it was found inconvenient, because, to use a phrase familiar at the time, it “cut into the middle of the clarets,” and so rendered it necessary to test a great number of samples. This is what I apprehend now. The right hon. Gentleman says it would be inconvenient to the officers of Revenue to examine a great many more samples imported. That is the objection; but it is not confined to the officers of the Revenue; the inconvenience is, no doubt, shared by the public—by the importers of wine, in loss of time, and perhaps in the injury caused to the fine wines by the opening of the casks. But I would rather have that matter discussed by those who are personally conversant with the subject. I have made my contribution to the discussion in a friendly sense, not being at all desirous of setting up my own views on a subject which, I think, requires serious consideration. I believe there will also be objections taken to the particular rate at which it is proposed to rise to higher degrees; but all these questions will come up in Committee on the Bill. Another matter—and really the important question raised on the scheme and Bill—is the transformation of the Malt Tax into the Beer Duty. It is, of course, open to observation that that is a proposal which has its political side. We heard, the other night, from the Home Secretary, what wonderful interest would hereafter attach to the night of the 10th of June, when this proposal was made, and how the Liberals would be greeted with the applause of the agriculturists. I do not, for a moment, deny the right of the Government, if they think fit, to come forward and make a political Budget, and make offers to gain the support and confidence of the agricultural interest. I rather doubt myself whether, when the proposal is thoroughly examined, it will be found to be a benefit so great to the farmers as, at first sight, may appear. But here, again, I think a great deal will depend on the criticisms which will be more properly reserved for Committee as to the exact manner in which the change will operate, the exact restrictions to be put on the brewing trade, and the facilities that will be retained. Of course, we must bear in mind the question of the importation of foreign malt. I altogether dissociate myself from any proposal to object to the taking off the duty; but I should not be surprised if, after all, it caused a good deal of grumbling. This proposal to change the Malt Tax into a Beer Duty is one that has often and often been made; but I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), when he said the credit of a proposal of a financial character ought not to rest with irresponsible persons who had sagacity to discover it, but with the Government, which sees its way to adopt and introduce it. Therefore, I do not think it at all worth while to enter into the question as to the origin of the suggestion; but, at the same time, I may say that if there is anyone who is entitled to credit in the matter it is the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who in 1870 brought forward the proposal, and seriously pressed the right hon. Gentleman in favour of a course similar to that which is now being taken. The proposal made was that a brewers' licence duty should be substituted for the Malt Tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day (Mr. Lowe) admitted the general argument in favour of such a change; but he objected to it mainly on two grounds. It was inconvenient to collect so large an amount of Revenue from something like 33,000 brewers instead of 9,000 maltsters, and it would involve restrictions of the brewing trade which would be vexatious and inconvenient. For these reasons he did not feel himself able to make a proposition; but he promised to consider the subject. The matter was brought before me, and precisely the same objections were raised when I came to consider it. The number of brewers had diminished at the time; but, still, we had to consider—is it safe in the interests of the Revenue to collect taxes which produce £8,000,000 from 23,000 persons instead of from 8,000? Is it safe to do it when you consider that the process of brewing is far more easy than the process of malting; and will it not be necessary, if the change is made, to introduce restrictions into the brewing trade? I did not see my way to deal with the question; my right hon. Friend is bolder, and is attempting to deal with it. I will not say anything with regard to the difficulties he has to encounter. The number of brewers is larger than the number of maltsters, and it may be increased by the new system. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] My right hon. Friend shakes his head; but, at any rate, it would be easier to set up an illicit brewery than an illicit malt kin, and brewing takes a shorter time and requires less apparatus. That is a point which is of serious importance to the Revenue. It has been said that co-operative arrangements for brewing might have furnished a means of evasion; but I am glad to hear that that is to be guarded against in the Act. There are two questions which arise. One is, what will be the financial effect of the change? and the other is, whether it is necessary to pay such a price as we are asked to pay for it? Financially, the change will prove much more favourable to the Revenue than we have hitherto been led to expect. In the Paper placed in our hands it is stated that the amount of Beer Duty receivable in five months will be £3,800,000. I should like to know whether this may be taken as a fair sample of the year? I understand from the right hon. Gentleman it may not, and, therefore, I may not pursue the calculation; but if that might have been done, the Beer Duty would have produced £750,000 more than the Malt Tax. As to the price we have to pay, I admit there is much good in the proposal, provided we are secured against fraudulent evasion. You ought not to look a gift horse in the mouth; but this is not exactly a gift horse, because you have to pay for it, and in a manner extremely unpleasant to a large number of taxpayers, by an addition of 1*d.* to the Income Tax, at an inconvenient time of the year, to the upsetting of arrangements made on the basis of a lower rate of the tax. It will be a serious addition to the burdens of the Income Tax payer at a time when we know he is not in a flourishing position. Although there is improvement in trade, and there are good hopes of the harvest, yet we know the country is still suffering materially from depression, and an increase of the Income Tax is by no means an acceptable proposal. There is considerable force in the question which has been asked—why should you lay this upon the Income Tax payers, and why not put it upon the beer drinkers? The reply is that it is a good investment of the penny, and that we should gain the advantage of being able, at any time when we want a larger Revenue, to raise it in a simple manner by an addition to the Beer Duty. That is an important consideration; but it cuts both ways. An addition to the duty on the beer consumed by the people of this country is likely to be unpopular, and may lead to inconvenient consequences. It is exceedingly difficult to raise additional Revenue by additional taxes of this kind on articles largely consumed by the working classes, as we found when dealing with the Tobacco Duties. The consumer expected the same quantity for his money, and so, in order to meet the additional tax, the dealer found it to his interest to tamper with the quality; and the same may happen in the case of beer. But I do not care to prophecy all these remote consequences. It seems to me the Budget, as a whole, is hardly justifiable in respect of the time when, and the grounds upon which, it is brought forward. Without denying there is a great deal of good in it, I think there is not sufficient justification for disturbing the financial arrangements of the year at this season. I think there was very great want of judgment in taking the particular line that was taken with regard to the Commercial Treaty and the Wine Duties. As to the Malt Tax and the Beer Duty which is proposed, it is an experiment which is to be tried under conditions that cannot but cause anxiety to the guardians of the Revenue; and with regard to the Income Tax I must say it is a measure likely to be unpopular, and which can be hardly justified in the eyes of those upon whom we call to pay it. Considering that the main proposal is not to involve any loss of Revenue, but is to increase it, it would have been better—if it had been thought necessary and desirable to make the change this year—that arrangements should have been made for carrying it into effect without additional taxation. I believe it could have been done by some arrangement which would have been justified. You were not going to incur additional expenditure; you were not surrendering a tax; you were only transferring it to a form in which it will be more profitable. I have no intention of objecting to the second reading of the Bill; but I hope when we get into Committee we shall be in a position to criticize to more advantage some of the details to which I have drawn attention.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, he approved the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to abolish the 27 degree standard as the point of demarcation between the so-called natural and artificial wines; he also approved of the lowering of the limit of strength for wines below 42 degrees, because that point was so high as to encourage the manufacture for the English market of wines imperfectly fermented through an excessive addition of spirit. To charge the duty according to the alcoholic strength of the wine would avoid all danger of strong wines being made use of for the purpose of illicit distillation. He must, however, take exception to the scale of duties as proposed in the Bill, because it involved a gradation by degree which was certain, in his opinion, to cause great trouble, to lead to disputes between the merchants and Custom House authorities, and prove vexatious to the trade. The present system of charging the duty upon wines had operated adversely to the interests both of the consumers and of the importers, by stimulating the importation of highly brandied but badly fermented wines. The bulk of the bottled wines was imported from Germany and from France; whereas the wines in wood came to this country from Spain and from Portugal, and great care was required in the re-adjustment of the duties not to place their wines in a worse position than the light wines of France. A Return made in 1835 showed that the Peninsular wines, which were of a high alcoholic strength—namely, from 35 to 37 degrees—paid upon the scale then in use 225 per cent more than was charged upon the light wines of 20 degrees, and he was glad that this inequality was about to be reduced. The Committee on the subject had drawn up their Report with a desire not to go beyond the Order of Reference, and to leave the delicate questions involved to be dealt with, as much as possible, by the Executive; but they felt that the alteration in the Wine Duties was a matter which closely affected our commercial relations with other countries. He thought that when they were altering the Wine Duties they ought to have framed the scale in such a way as would have facilitated, to a great degree, the consumption of wine, which was only drunk in the proportion of about 3 per cent of the alcoholic strength to the total consumption of alcohol in this country. The heavier wines were, in his opinion, unduly burdened.

Mr. SLAGG said, that Her Majesty's Government deserved the thanks of the House for the action they had taken with respect to the negotiations with France, which he believed were fraught with great promise to the commerce of this country. The Legislature usually paid too little attention to matters favourable to the raising of revenue, and too much attention to matters which involved its often lavish expenditure. He, therefore, thankfully acknowledged the efforts of the Government to extend the commercial relations of the country with France. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed his regret that we had no assurance that we should get from France some return for the duties we were surrendering. So far as he understood the letters which had been interchanged between the two Governments he thought they had that assurance. The negotiations had been, and he hoped and believed would be, carried on on that basis. He regretted that such negotiations were necessary, and that France was not prepared to do voluntarily that which was manifestly for her own good. They had, however, to face the condition of things which existed. They were bound to reduce import duties when the Revenue enabled them to do so. The French and other Governments would not approach us unless we brought something in our hands in order to induce them to bargain with us; and the only thing we could bring to the French Government was the Wine Duty. The Treaty of 1860 had been, to some extent, foisted upon the French people. They regarded it as having been the result of underhand negotiations, and that fact had embarrassed us in all our negotiations since that time. A different state of things now, however, existed. France had made an approach to us, and it would be adverse to the interests of the country if the House of Commons and the public opinion of England did not welcome that approach. The products of France were required here, and our products found a ready market in France. In that country they had to deal with a prudent, solvent, and enterprising class of traders; not, perhaps, so bold or enterprising as English traders, but that was more than made up by their prudence and solvency. France, too, furnished the key to our Treaty relations with other countries. With regard to Spain and Portugal, we had lost a valuable trade, and it was of the utmost importance that we should come to terms with those countries. In consequence of the Wine Duties, the Spanish Government had imposed such restrictions on the import of English goods as almost to annihilate our trade with the country. Great advantages had, however, resulted from the Commercial Treaty of 1860 with France. Before that Treaty, the textile, stoneware, glassware, hardware, cutlery, and other imported industries were excluded from France. In 1859, our exports to that country amounted to £4,000,000 only, and our imports to £16,000,000, while in 1878 our exports had risen to £14,000,000 and our imports to £41,000,000; and he saw no limit to the increase in the trade if satisfactory terms were made in the new Treaty. Such negotiations as the Government were engaged in in France, and a mutual interchange of opinions, formed the best means of teaching Frenchmen their true trade interests. He rejoiced at the excellent understanding developed between the two countries by the Treaty of Commerce of 1860 and similar engagements. Let anyone compare the heated, jealous, and angry temper which prevailed in the days of Lord Palmerston with the calm, friendly, and business-like relations that existed to-day. He believed that the good terms upon which England and France were with one another would gain in intensity after the acceptance of the Treaty now proposed by our Government, and would afford another guarantee for the maintenance of peace.

MR. ORR EWING said, that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg), who had just spoken, complained of the duty upon French wines being only reduced to 6*d.*, and put forward a wish that it should be reduced to 3*d.*, on the ground that the prime cost of wine was 8*d.* per gallon. He thought the hon. Member would be astonished to hear that the prime cost of whisky was something like 1*s.* 6*d.* or 1*s.* 9*d.* per gallon of proof spirit, and that there was a tax upon that of no less than 10*s.* Surely that disparity was much greater than the one he drew attention to. The hon. Gentleman seemed to consider that their import duties ought to be reduced according to their financial condition. Happily they had but few import duties to reduce, for the only one they had was that on wine, brandy, rum, tea, and coffee, which were luxuries of life. He would like to ask the hon. Gentleman if he proposed to reduce the duty on wines, brandy, and rum in proportion to the condition of the country from the financial point of view, without doing justice to the distillers and brewers of the country, by reducing the duties upon the articles they produce in proportion. He did not think that he could seriously mean such a thing, and the country would not submit to it. The hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright) thought that the great defect of the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in not imposing an increased duty according to the alcoholic strength; and he suggested, as a way of getting out of the difficulty, an ad valorem duty. He said he had no doubt that they might be subjected to fraud under an ad valorem duty, by putting a smaller value upon wine imported into this country than it was really worth; but he afterwards thought as to that that they had a remedy at hand, because they had their Custom House officers to watch, and if they saw that too low a value was put upon the wine which was imported they could take possession of it. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) was afraid, however, that if they allowed of the Customs confiscating wine which was considered as of too low a rate of value, the Government would become a great wine merchant, because it would be so often tried that they would take possession of a great quantity of wine which he presumed they would sell and not destroy. He was quite satisfied that if they looked at the subject from all points of view it would be seen that the suggestion of the hon. Member, if carried out, would lead to serious difficulties. Then, as to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), he seemed to have a great dislike to whisky, and could not work himself up to the enthusiasm which Scotchmen generally do in demanding that justice or some approach to justice should be done in regard to taxing whisky in comparison with wine and beer, and he asserted that it would be most injurious to the interests of Scotland if whisky should be taxed at a lower duty. He disputed that point. There was a common belief among hon. Members, and among Englishmen especially, that Scotland was a much more dissipated nation than England. The very reverse, however, had been proved, for if they took the quantity of alcohol that was in wine, beer, and spirits drunk by the people of England, compared with that drunk in Scotland, they would find that the people of England drank at the rate of 50 per cent more than the people of Scotland. He felt thankful that the right hon. Member for Montrose, although a Scotchman, was not Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he felt very certain, from the remarks which the present occupant of that Office made in his Budget speech, that he had a much more kindly feeling and a much more kindly intention towards amending the discrepancy in the taxation of England and Scotland than the right hon. Member for Montrose indicated in his speech. He had listened with great interest and satisfaction to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when introducing his Budget to the House. But he did not concur with his proposals as to wine, and he regretted that he should have thought it necessary to put an additional penny on the Income Tax to carry out his proposals. Still, the change he proposed to make by abolishing the Malt Tax and putting a duty on beer, inaugurated a new, and what appeared to him (Mr. Orr Ewing) to be a sound system, and would be a mine of wealth to future Chancellors of the Exchequer, who would be able thus to raise more taxation in an emergency.

Mr. Cartwright.

He trusted, however, that the means thus at command would be used to readjust taxation. By an increased taxation of beer, they might abolish the tea and coffee duties, and even the Income Tax. There was no part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which gave him more satisfaction than that part in which he announced his intention of abolishing the Malt Tax. The right hon. Gentleman had said—

“Now, let us consider what that entails. It means, in the first place, that we are to do away with a revenue approaching £8,000,000. It is quite evident that £8,000,000 are not to be had to fill a gap of that kind without financial changes of the most formidable kind—I would say, in a financial sense, of a revolutionary kind. Even this is not the greatest objection. Let us consider the gross inequality which would be established by such a measure, and that in more senses than one in a country like this, where we raise one-third of our Revenue, or something like it, by taxing alcoholic drinks. You would say, in respect of one of these alcoholic drinks, that it should be set entirely free, and that the other two should be made subject to a heavy duty; so that the man who drinks a glass of whisky-punch, even though he dilutes his spirit with water down to the weakness of beer, would be subject to an enormous tax, while the beer-drinker would pay nothing at all. The inequality would be so gross that such a proposal would be inadmissible. But the inequality is not only between the different kinds of alcoholic beverages, but the inequality goes much further. Consider what it would be between the three countries which make up the United Kingdom. Beer is the standing and staple drink of the people of England, but whisky is the standing and staple drink in the same proportion of the people of Scotland and the people of Ireland, and you would be about to establish a state of things in which the staple drink of England should be entirely removed from a tax, and in which the staple drink in Ireland and Scotland should continue to contribute many millions to the English Revenue.”—[3 Hansard, cclii. 1638-9.]

He was grateful for this frank admission that Scotland and Ireland had a deep interest in the mode and extent to which the people of England contributed to the Exchequer for the alcohol they consumed, and that it would have been unjust to these countries that beer should not have been taxed when the Malt Tax was abolished. But he wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman, and to the House, that he did not do full justice to Scotland and Ireland by this Budget, because he only proposed to put a duty upon beer, porter, and ale equivalent to the present Malt Tax. He hoped that in future the Three Kingdoms would be put upon an equality with respect to the taxation on the alcohol they consumed. Taxation on alcoholic drinks should be laid on in proportion to the amount of alcohol they contained. This was the only just principle, and, if it were adopted, no foreign nation would have any ground to complain. How did the matter stand at present? Whisky and other spirits paid 10s. per gallon on proof spirits if distilled in this country; and if they were imported from foreign countries, they paid 10s. 5d. — the 5d. being paid to compensate the distiller at home for some supposed loss sustained owing to our more stringent Excise Laws—while Spain and Portugal paid on an average 6s. per gallon of proof spirits, and French wines paid on an average 4s., whereas beer paid only 1s. 8d. per gallon of proof spirits. Was it therefore to be wondered at that these countries complained that free-trading England should give such an enormous advantage to the home manufacture of beer? The right hon. Gentleman, by his Budget, intended, to a certain extent, to lessen this inequality by lowering the duty on light wines of 20 degrees to 6d., adding 1d. for every degree up to 35 degrees, so that wines of 20 degrees of strength, which was one-fifth of proof spirits, would only pay 2s. 6d. per gallon of proof spirits, or one-fourth of what was paid in respect to whisky or other spirits. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if this was just to Scotland? He was sure that he must answer that it was not. He had another objection to the proposed alteration of the duty upon wine, and that was the manner in which it was to be done. Power was given to the Government to reduce the wine duties, in order that they might give some sop to the French to induce them to arrange a more favourable Commercial Treaty with this country. He disapproved of this mode of arranging our fiscal duties. We would be placed in an awkward position if we determined at a time of great emergency to increase the duty upon beer. We would be prevented from increasing the duty upon wine by our hands being tied by this Treaty. The only just principle was to tax all alcoholic drinks according to their alcoholic strength. He did not propose that they should raise the duty upon wine and beer at present to the high duty upon whisky and other spirits, and he thought the duty upon whisky should never be reduced. He felt grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the courage he had displayed in grappling with this drink question by abolishing the Malt Tax, and putting a tax on beer, which was one of the most important measures proposed to the country since the great Free Trade measures of Sir Robert Peel. The question had been for many years before the country. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) had in and out of the House advocated this change. In the Budget discussion of 1874 he said—

“There is but one way by which the malt tax can be repealed, and I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have the courage to grapple with the question—by placing brewers under the Excise, and charging them for their production, according to its alcoholic strength. If the right hon. Gentleman would have the courage to do that, he would have funds not only to abolish the malt tax, but the tea and coffee duties, and the income tax, and would have a large sum to devote to reduce local taxation. But above all, Sir, he would have the satisfaction of feeling that he, an English Chancellor of the Exchequer, had done justice to Scotland and Ireland, who were powerless of themselves to effect the change in equalizing the taxation of the three countries in their national beverages.”
—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 1194.]

The Scotch Members and Scotchmen generally would be thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for grappling with this important question.

MR. M. A. BASS desired to say a few words on the subject of this transfer of the Malt Tax to a duty on the manufactured article—not so much because he, in common with a large body of traders, was interested in the question, as because he also more directly represented a large body of gentlemen whose interests he feared would be prejudicially affected by the proposed change. They deprecated the change that was proposed both in principle and detail. They were told that three classes of persons would be benefited—namely, the farmer, the brewer, and the consumer. They all knew that for the last 50 years the question of the Malt Tax had been made a political stalking-horse out of which to make political capital with the agriculturists; but the more the question was looked into the more adverse the proposed change would appear to be to the real interests of the farmer. The Prime Minister, in introducing his Budget, made no secret of what would be its effect. He said—

Mr. M. A. Bass

“I am strongly of opinion that a tax like the Malt Tax has a powerful effect in gaining an artificial preference for a particular commodity grown by a farmer to the exclusion of other commodities.”

He thought there could be no doubt that that was the effect of the Malt Tax. The present excise regulations practically confined the brewer to the use of barley in the shape of malt. There were few countries indeed that in ordinary seasons could grow barley which could compete in quality with that produced in this country. Barley, in fact, was the one article in which the British farmer could compete with advantage with his foreign competitor. They had heard a good deal of protection to the farmer. He should like to ask the House what better form of protection the farmer could possibly have than a system of regulations which compelled the brewer to make use of a particular article manufactured in a particular manner, and that article one in which the British farmer was pre-eminent. He knew that it was said that the tendency of the present tax on malt was unduly to push up the better class of barley at the expense of the lower. He would not deny that, to some extent, that might be its effect; but, if so, so much the worse for the grower of the better class of barley when the Malt Tax was removed and placed upon beer. But, at any rate, under the present system of taxation, large quantities of medium barley were malted; and that was due, to a great extent, to the preference given to that grain by the present Excise regulations. But he should like to ask the British farmer how he considered that he would fare in future when all restriction was removed on the use of materials by brewers? He would have to compete with the whole world in beer-producing cereals, as he had now to do in the production of food-producing ones. At present the foreign maltster was handicapped by the heavy duty on malt; but when that duty was removed he would, with his cheaper labour and the low rates of carriage, become a formidable competitor to his British rival. The Prime Minister stated that a duty of 6s. on the average barrel would impose no additional burden on the trader, and almost in the same sentence he told them he was about to get £400,000 more from the trader and to impose additional tions on him at a cost of £40,000 to the Revenue. Those who were led by the proposed change had carefully into its details, and on basis originally propounded by the hon. Gentleman they thought that revenue would benefit to the extent, £400,000, but more nearly of £500,000. The present Malt and Beer Duties amounted to 22s. 8½d. per quarter. It was proposed to raise it to 25s. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that one-third of the brewer's profit, or 10d., was due to the Malt Tax, and that the restriction about to be removed would be another 1s. to the consumer; and added 5½d. to give the turn of the tax to the Revenue. He produced a list of 25s. per quarter, and afterwards added it to 24s. by throwing them back on waste. He had somewhat modified his proposition that night. Those interested in that business were unable to say on what basis the consumer would get the benefit of 10d. on the malt-profit by the removal of the tax. He denied that the Excise restrictions on the making of malt were any appreciable burden either on the procedure or the buildings of the maltster. Speaking in the advice of responsible and experienced managers, and as a member of a firm that made more malt than any other maltster in the Kingdom, he could say that the right hon. Gentleman that the recent Excise regulations did not impose any appreciable restrictions on the business, and that if they were taken away with they would neither alter the buildings nor their procedure in any respect whatever. But they objected to the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that 24s. was a fair equivalent for the old duty of 22s. 8½d.; and they insisted still more to the basis on which the duty was to be assessed, and to the manner in which it was to be levied. The Inland Revenue estimated the produce of a quarter of malt to be four barrels of 1,055 gravity, equivalent to 100 gallons of extract. On that assumed basis a duty of 24s., or at the rate of 3s. 3d. for every pound of extract, was to be levied. But they contended that the minimum average produce of a quarter of malt was not 79 1-5lb., but 83 3-5lb. That at 3s. 3-5d. per pound would make the duty to be paid on each quarter of malt 26s. 8d., or 1s. 8d. per quarter more than the assumed tax of 24s. Again, the Malt Duty had hitherto been calculated on the number of quarters of barley steeped—not on the number of quarters of malt made from a given quantity of barley. On the average, 100 quarters of barley produced 105 quarters of malt, and the extra five quarters had not paid duty, acting, in fact, as a kind of discount or rebate, and making the duty in practice about 20s. 8d. instead of the nominal sum of 21s. 8d. But now the actual produce of the malt was to be taxed; the whole 105 quarters produced from each 100 quarters of barley would pay duty in the shape of beer extract, and thus an additional 1s. per quarter would be laid on the manufacturer. The total amount of the duty would be 26s. 8d. per quarter, or an addition of 4s., as compared with the old tax of 22s. 8d. There were 7,200,000 quarters of malt produced last year, and with the new tax the right hon. Gentleman would get 4s. a-quarter additional, or £1,400,000. The right hon. Gentleman had held out some hope of concessions. He proposed to give them 6 per cent instead of 4 per cent for waste. That was 6d. per quarter, and it would reduce the £1,400,000 to £1,200,000. Every point in the scale meant a difference of 5d. per barrel; and if the right hon. Gentleman gave them a real, substantial alteration of the scale, many of their objections to his proposal might be removed. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing his Budget, said he wished to make the regulations as easy as possible to the trade. He said there would be no interference with their premises or times of brewing, and that brewers could brew from what they pleased, and how they pleased. The new method of assessing the tax on beer was, however, derived from Austria; and he understood that the Austrian brewers actually groaned under their oppressive Excise regulations, and were now endeavouring to get the system on which the tax was collected from them modified. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman absolutely bristled with pains and penalties; and the restrictions on malting, which were now comparatively harmless, were to be transferred in a more onerous and inquisitorial form to the brewer. An Exciseman must live day and night on the brewers' premises, not a very pleasant matter to begin with. Again the Excise-man would be permanently installed in their fermenting rooms, and would supervise and interfere at that special stage of their manufacture which most demanded care and attention, and he would gain a knowledge of those details which they wished to guard most jealously from the eye of a stranger. Then they were to be liable to eight separate penalties of £100 each, and to one of £50. There would be a far greater number of entries and checks than under the old malt regulations. All their vessels were to be fixed in a way to be defined by the Inland Revenue Department, and conditions were laid down which a practical brewer would tell them it was impossible to fulfil, but which, nevertheless, if not complied with, would subject them to fines of £100. They would have to keep the produce of one brewing separate from the produce of another for 24 hours. That was impossible, and yet the brewer would have to pay a fine of £100 for not obeying that regulation. No doubt the Excise officers would meet them fairly; but those things showed the animus of the Bill. The Bill was of a most vexatious and inquisitorial character. The Prime Minister said that he was removing restrictions on the making of malt which would be worth 1s. to the consumer; but he took nothing off the brewer for imposing far more objectionable restrictions on the manufacture. No doubt the number of private breweries had been decreasing from year to year; but he greatly feared that under the stimulus of the bonus of 6s. a-quarter private breweries would largely increase. Hitherto the private brewer had paid the full amount of duty on the malt; now he would have a bonus of 6s. per barrel, and would have to pay only a nominal licence tax. He was glad to hear that private brewing was to be restricted to the occupier; he was satisfied that if that were not done they would have co-operative breweries springing up in every part of the country. He failed to see how the employer of labour could be prevented from brewing large quantities of beer at a cheaper price than he could buy it, and so paying wages partly in beer. As to declaration and assessment by the occupier himself, was it in human nature for him to be more punctilious than many were in assessing themselves for the Income Tax? He feared that in the ultimate result the Revenue would be defrauded to the detriment of the Excise and of the honest trader, or the Inland Revenue, in self-defence, would be compelled to exercise a more stringent supervision, which would lead to an agitation for the withdrawal of all restrictions on private brewing. On the assumption that the brewer would derive a great advantage from being able to use all sorts of materials in substitution for the good, old-fashioned, honest malt, it was proposed to put upon him additional taxation to the amount of 3s. 6d. per quarter, and we were to pay 1d. more of Income Tax; and by a cruel irony the money thus obtained was to be used to cheapen French wines to the extent of £300,000 a-year in order to conciliate the French producer, whose Government was about to impose additional taxation on the import of beer into France. No sufficient reason had been shown for so great and so sudden a fiscal change. He believed the farmer would suffer most of all from the reduction in value of the higher qualities of barley, from the competition in foreign malt, the competition in maize, and other cereals; and he believed the consumer would get beer neither cheaper nor better; while the brewers and the public would have to pay heavily in increased taxation, and the manufacturer would be subject to harassing and inquisitorial supervision and restriction.

MR. WATNEY said, that, as the right hon. Gentleman only desired a substantial equivalent for what he gave up, he believed the brewers would have no difficulty in showing that their case was a hard one, and in appealing to his sense of justice. The real question was the extract per quarter. The London brewers, who had had several meetings, put it down at 85 lb.; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, therefore, taxing them more heavily than he imagined, as he had evidently calculated the new duty on a supposed extract of 80 lb. per quarter. The 22s. 8d. the Government got now would be made 26s. 9d. They had submitted to him a memorial bearing on the supposed benefit of 10d. per quarter in respect of the malt duty and of 1s. per quarter on account of restrictions. The maltster had not kept malt longer than six months; he had been able to get three months' credit from the Government by giving a bond, and almost three months by paying 3½ per cent per annum to the Revenue, which came to 2d. per quarter. As the maltster was thus able to hold malt for six months, at a cost of only 2d. a-quarter, it was not fair to say he would benefit to the amount of 10d. by the duty being taken off. The estimated profit of 2s. 3d. per quarter was not at all too much for buying barley, holding the malt some time, and running the risk of the market, and it was not to be supposed that of that 2s. 3d. so much as 10d. could be saved by not having to pay the duty. At present the restriction pressed very lightly indeed on the maltster; all the improvements that could be made were incorporated in the Excise regulations, and without the Malt Duty the malting business would have to be carried on in the same way. In the main items of expense—rent, labour, and coal—nothing would be saved. In future there would be restrictions, not on the finishing, but on the middle stage, when they gave most trouble. The removal of the old Beer Duty in 1830 was considered a very good thing by the brewers. It was 10s., but was reduced to 9s. 2d. by allowances; and when it was taken off the price of beer was reduced 12s., or 2s. 10d. more than the actual duty taken off. The restrictions to be put on the brewers would be much more onerous than those necessary for collecting the Malt Duty. The question arose whether the capacities of all the vessels used were to be tested, and whether the stock was to be constantly checked, as in the case of the distiller. The duty was to be levied on what was called "the square"—when the beer began to ferment. Were they to be prohibited from putting in afterwards sugar, saccharine, or wort? If not, there would have to be a strict guard to protect the honest trader. If the brewers could make out a good case, and could show they were not benefited to the extent supposed, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would modify his proposal as affecting them. The figures arrived at by the London brewers corresponded with those quoted by the hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. M. A. Bass), and they showed that the brewers would have to pay a tax of 26s. 9½d. per quarter, instead of the 22s. 8d. which they now paid. He trusted that in these circumstances the right hon. Gentleman would consent to receive a deputation on the subject, who would be able to give him ample proof of the accuracy of their views with respect to it. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had taken into consideration the question of waste, and that the allowance for waste would be increased from 4 to 6 per cent. Without entering into a discussion with reference to the clauses of the Bill, he might say that he agreed with the hon. Member who had last spoken that many of them would be required to be altered in Committee—for instance, the clause fixing the time that all beer should be collected within the fermenting square within six hours, whereas in hot weather it was sometimes impossible to collect it within 18 hours. Then it was proposed that the beer should remain in the square 36 hours, whereas some brewers kept theirs in it only 12 hours. It was quite evident that the right hon. Gentleman had drawn up the measure without consulting the trade. He was, however, satisfied that the attention of the Government had only to be drawn to these points for them to be at once altered. He objected to the limit of £20 in value being fixed for the exemption of private brewers. He did not think that in proposing such a heavy duty there ought to be any exemptions at all, and certainly they ought not to extend beyond the agricultural labourer pure and simple. A farmer who was in the receipt of an income of £200 or £300 a-year had no claim to exemption; and he therefore thought that the rental limit of £20 should be reduced to £5, and he begged to give Notice that he would move an Amendment in Committee to that effect. In conclusion, he hoped that when we were entering into a Reciprocity Treaty with a foreign country we should require them, as some compensation for our reducing the duty upon their light wines, to reduce their duty on our beer.

MR. DUCKHAM urged that in the present depression of the agricultural interest it was necessary that something should be done for the farmers. He accepted the abolition of the Malt Tax as a boon; and, although it involved an addition of 1d. to the Income Tax. The cry urged by farmers was unheeded when the heavy addition of a 10d. Income Tax was imposed upon them for the abolition of the Turnpike Tolls, and a further increase of 1s. to 1s. 6d. Income Tax for the purposes of education. The thanks of the farmers were due to the Premier for the proposals he had submitted, and there was a general feeling that it was only right to tax the manufactured article instead of the raw material. If the new tax would produce an additional revenue of £1,000,000 per annum, as had been stated, it would be a fine speculation.

MR. O'SULLIVAN complained of the large amount of increased taxation put on Ireland by the operation of the scheme of the First Lord of the Treasury. At present the scale of taxation varied from £3 on licensed houses up to £11 a-year; but, by the new scheme, it would range from £5 to £24. On the average, the increase would be about £2 5s. a-year in Ireland. He would probably be met with the objection—"We give the power to sell wines as well as beer and spirits." He found, however, that as about one-fourth of the beersellers paid wine licence, the increase in the scale proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would have the effect of placing on Ireland no less a sum than £30,000 a-year in the way of additional taxation. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman's strong sense of equity to say whether Ireland did not pay quite enough taxation already without adding to it. According to the old scale, the duty charged on the small retailers, those who were valued under £10, was £3 6s. 4½d.; whereas, by the new scale, the duty of £5 would be imposed, and this additional taxation would fall on those who were the least able to bear it—namely, the poorest class. The second scale of duty was to be advanced from £5 10s. 3d. to about £8 10s. Considering the poverty and misery which prevailed in Ireland, he thought the increase altogether disproportionate and unfair. He expected he would be met with the argument that this additional taxation fell upon the people who took drink. To some extent, he admitted that it had; but the fact remained that this £30,000 a-year was to be taken out of the pockets of Irishmen to save the pockets of Englishmen, without the former receiving an equivalent. All he asked the right hon. Gentleman to do in adjusting this taxation was to impose less taxation upon a poor country with a small population than upon a country that was very rich and very

populous, if there were scales of charges at all. There ought to be a different scale of charges on that principle between the two countries. Was it fair that a small trader in a village, whether in Ireland, Scotland, or England, with 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants only to depend upon for a livelihood, should be charged as much duty as the wealthy trader in Regent Street or the Haymarket? It was true that the scale of duty would be regulated in proportion to the valuation of the trader's premises; but it was a well-known fact that some traders in the City of London received more profit in one week than small traders in country villages receive in the whole of the 52 weeks of the year. To apply the same scale to the small and the large trader alike was neither fair nor just. The scale ought to be regulated according to population, drawing the line at, say, 10,000 inhabitants. Another matter to which he invited the attention of the Prime Minister was that the Revenue of Ireland was raised according to the Government tenement valuation; the Income Tax, county cess, and poor rate were all raised on that basis; but an exception in favour of the Excise was made a pretext for increasing the licences of Irish spirit retailers. The Excise officer might now say—"I do not believe in the Government valuation; it is not sufficient. I will make a valuation of my own, and impose the tax accordingly." In that way an unfair and unjust tax would be levied. He, therefore, hoped the right hon. Gentleman would so alter the Bill as to have the tax levied on the Government valuation. If the right hon. Gentleman declined to do so, he would himself move an Amendment to that effect in Committee; and, if necessary, press it to a division, because he knew of cases occurring in Ireland where the Excise officer had increased the valuation, though the Government valuation was at the full amount. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), he, for one, could not support it. He preferred the proposal of the Prime Minister, who wished to raise £1,000,000 by an increase of the Income Tax, while the hon. Member for Glasgow wanted to raise it out of beer. This would be unfair, because a Beer Tax would be put on the poor man who had no income but his daily labour, while the Income Tax would fall on the man who had an income. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was, therefore, fairer than that of the hon. Member for Glasgow. A man with an income large enough to render him liable to Income Tax might easily curtail his expenses so as to pay the additional penny in the pound.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he did not rise to find fault with the Budget, but to make an earnest appeal on behalf of the farmers, who complained bitterly of the Income Tax. He did not object to pay the Income Tax out of the profits he made; but the farmers, who had been supplying his workmen with cheap food, had fair ground of complaint. The landlords had, to a certain extent, come to the rescue of the farmers; but they had only begun to do it, and if more help was not given, he believed a large number of farmers would be ruined. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to take into his consideration the case of the farmers in connection with the Income Tax, and to exempt farmers from payment of Income Tax if they could produce a balance-sheet showing that they were not making a profit. He believed that many of them, owing to bad harvests and foreign competition, were not only realizing no profit, but were losing their capital.

COLONEL BARNE believed that, as the law stood at present, if the farmer could show that he was not realizing a profit, he could, on appealing to the Commissioners, obtain an abatement of Income Tax. He complained that, while the right hon. Gentleman had raised the licences of the wine merchants and publicans, no increase had been made on grocers' licences. This was very much felt by the publicans and the wine merchants. It was well known that the grocers' licences gave great facilities for secret drinking, especially among women.

MR. WILLIAMSON rose to express the great satisfaction with which he regarded the proposals made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Supplemental Budget—a satisfaction which he was sure would be felt throughout the country. There was one point referred to by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright) to which he desired to call attention. He referred to the 20 degrees of alcoholic strength upon which it was proposed to impose a duty on light wines. He was, however, informed that the great bulk of common wines grown in France ranged from 12 to 13 degrees, and he apprehended that if they admitted those wines on a lower scale of taxation the French Government would be satisfied with the fixing of such a limit as 6*d.*, which would stimulate the import into this country of cheap wines. The limit of 15 degrees, he thought, might very well be adopted instead of the 20 degrees for the limit of 6*d.* duty. He had no sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and re-echoed by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing), for the taxation of whisky as compared with beer. The hon. Members argued as if Irishmen and Scotchmen were sent into the world on the express condition that they should consume whisky, and that there could be no disadvantage in making a broad distinction between ardent spirits and beer. There could, however, be no injustice, because Scotchmen and Irishmen were as free as were Englishmen to consume beer. But there might be a change in the national taste and habits and customs in Scotland and Ireland which might be of a manifest advantage. The hon. Member for Glasgow argued as if it were the duty of the Government to stereotype bad habits and customs; but he would find that in 1751 and 1753, legislation with respect to the Gin Acts brought about a highly beneficial effect on the public morals, and he thought great advantage to the public morality would be brought about by the proposed changes of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. And, just as there must be a broad distinction between the duties charged on ardent spirits and the duty charged on beer, so must they continue to collect higher duties on the higher alcoholic wines of Spain and Portugal than on the lighter wines of France. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring his powerful mind to bear on this question. The removal of the restrictions on the manufacture of beer with regard to malt would, he considered, bring about important results in this country. They knew that Bavarian beer was not made altogether of malt, but to a great extent of raw grain. Bavarian beer, he need not say, was a most excellent beer—and prizes had been awarded it in Germany, Belgium, and other countries because of its excellent qualities, but, perhaps, more especially because it could be kept in open vessels a long time without the chance of its getting stale—and this might be an important consideration with regard to the keeping of beer fresh over Sunday. In conclusion, he trusted the First Lord of the Treasury would be chary in making concessions with regard to the duty on beer, and he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman upon his satisfactory Budget.

MR. BIDDELL was under the impression that he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer once say that wine could bear a good deal higher taxation than beer, which was the beverage of the poorer classes. At all events, those who could afford to drink wine, which was a luxury, could afford to pay a good tax for it. If he was correct in this supposition, the right hon. Gentleman was somewhat inconsistent in placing a tax on beer and facilitating the introduction of wines. The present was a very inappropriate time to increase the tax on beer, as they were called upon to take £300,000 off the duty on French wines. This, no doubt, would please Frenchmen, as it would stimulate the consumption of their wines in this country. Speaking generally, he approved the principles of the Budget, and thought a Beer Duty preferable to a Malt Duty. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reduce the poor man's licence from 6s. to 2s., and he would find a line ready drawn in the Small Tenants' Rating Act, which applied to houses rated under £6. His object in rising was to invite the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the 33rd clause of the Bill, and to ask him to consider whether he would not omit the words, "and lands thereunto appertaining," thus giving relief to a very large number of poor farmers holding from 10 to 20 acres? That class was deserving of great sympathy. They lived as labourers did, but worked a great deal harder, and he trusted their case would be favourably considered, for no class were more worthy of having their burdens lessened, and no class required it more. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) as to the vice of drunkenness; but he was at the same time strongly of opinion that good sound beer, in moderate quantity, was the best possible drink for working men. It suited himself if he had been working, and he should be sorry to see any legislation passed which would have the effect of preventing such persons from procuring at a reasonable price the liquor which was calculated to increase their strength for the duties which they had to perform. There was much good in the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman; but the Bill contained hardly a clause that he would not like to see amended.

MR. GURDON said, he thought the Bill would give to the farmers a boon which they had scarcely hoped to obtain, and, on behalf of the farmers of Norfolk, he begged to thank the Government for its introduction. At the same time, he regretted that the measure would impose a tax upon persons who brewed their beer in small quantities for purely home consumption; and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to lessening the amount of that tax.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR trusted that the negotiations in reference to the Commercial Treaty with France might be brought to a successful issue, and, for that purpose, would gladly see large discretionary powers vested in the hands of the Executive. Hitherto the Government of this country had been able to offer something in exchange for the advantages given by foreign Governments in Commercial Treaties; but he feared that the means at the disposal of the Government by which these concessions were obtained were gradually, but with certainty, coming to an end. People occasionally talked as if foreign Powers modified their tariffs in the direction of Free Trade in consequence of their holding Free Trade doctrines. This was not so. They modified their tariffs because we gave them some substantial inducement to do so. But the substantial inducements it was in our power to give were nearly at an end. We had so simplified our own tariffs that any further simplification was almost impossible. The proposed reduction in the Wine Duties was probably the last, or nearly the last, bribe it would be possible for any English Government to hold out to induce a foreign Government to adopt principles of taxation which would be for its benefit not less than our own. Under these circum-

it would be difficult to draw the line. The Government would have to consider what course they should adopt.

MR. MULHOLLAND thought, from the course of the debate, that whatever might be the abstract objections to a Commercial Treaty, both sides of the House recognized the practical benefits that had resulted from the French Treaty, and were equally determined to support the Government in its negotiations with France. The extension of trade in 1860, which had exceeded the expectations of everyone, justified the policy of Commercial Treaties, and the Treaty, being followed by others with the principal nations of Europe, had had a moral effect that was as conspicuous as its material results. With regard to the Wine Duties, taking them in connection with the negotiations now going on, the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was probably the best that could be devised, though it seemed to him to introduce modifications that were, at the present moment, unnecessary. Some of the considerable changes might have been deferred until negotiations with Spain and Portugal had been entered upon, and the Government need not have shown their readiness to give France greater advantages than were asked for. As things were, there was nothing in the total of the Wine Duties of which anyone could reasonably complain. In fact, it would be generally admitted that wine was taxed lightly, in proportion to its value, rather than heavily; but there was an inequality which could not be logically defended, and a certain amount of hardship also in the largeness of the class of wines above 26 degrees. As the House was aware, the principle on which the duty was fixed in 1860 was that all wines between 26 and 40 degrees of strength should pay the maximum duty. The result of the adoption of that system was that wines of a low strength, as compared with those of a high strength, paid an excessive duty. Two modes of getting rid of this inequality of the duty had been proposed—first, to divide the class from 26 to 40 degrees in the middle; and secondly, to sub-divide it into classes of every 5 degrees of strength. Those modes, however, were open to the same objection as the present system, though in a less degree—namely, that there would be under them always an overcharge upon the wines of the lower strength in each class. He had, therefore, made a proposal in the Wine Committee of last year similar to that which the right hon. Gentleman now made, and it was a singular fact that every Member of the Committee who sat upon the opposite side of the House had then voted against that proposal. It was a satisfaction to him, and to those who thought with him, that a proposal which had emanated from their side of the House had been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Oxford had revived a right of contract, which had engaged the attention of the Wine Committee last year; but he had omitted to mention that he (Mr. Mulholland) had succeeded in carrying an Amendment to his Report by nine votes to five—

This was in opposition to the proposal of the hon. Member, that wine should be taxed as a specific article, “Wine,” at a uniform duty. He need not remind the House of the large proportion of the Revenue which was derived from the taxes on alcoholic drinks; and, with respect to both malt liquor and spirits, the tax was in direct proportion to the strength. On that principle would wine be made an exception? There was no practical difficulty experienced in taxing spirits for each degree of alcoholic strength, and it was given in evidence before the Wine Committee, that there would be no difficulty in applying that same principle to wine. There was one part of the proposal of the Prime Minister to which he hoped he would adhere; that was the proposal to put wine in bottle into the highest class. Wine in bottle was, as a rule, wine of a higher quality; and as it was not practicable to apply an ad valorem principle to wine—although, if practicable, it would be just—this exportation of bottled wines, would in a rough but practical way, attain that object. The French themselves acted on this principle. Their internal duty on wine in bottle was eight times higher than on wine in cask. Even on the lowest strength the proposal of the Prime Minister was only four times higher, and he might mention that the Customs Returns showed the value of wine ex-

advocate of Free Trade. This ingenious theory of retaliatory duties was, in fact, only a disguise for their old friend Protection. Foreign Governments were not to be misled by threats of imposing such duties. For instance, let them take the case of the United States. If the United States could be got to modify their tariff on iron and other metals, it would be most advantageous to us. The only way in which we could work upon their fears was to threaten to impose a duty on grain and other provisions which came to us in such enormous quantities from America. That would be very acceptable to a large class of farmers, for they would be getting a certain amount of protection, and this would ultimately compel the United States to reduce their duties on iron. But would anyone seriously propose legislation to do that? If we took a single step of that kind, we would find ourselves in a commercial warfare with the whole of our customers all over the world, and we would have to retrace our steps with ignominy, or to arrive at the state of things which existed before the late Sir Robert Peel began to reform our tariff. He highly valued Commercial Treaties, if they could be secured without sacrificing principle on our part. He was satisfied of the great advantages of these Treaties with a country like France. But Commercial Treaties would be purchased at too high a price if we were to obtain them by falling back upon the system of commercial warfare. We might assume that we were a Free Trade nation, and that we were going on the principle of doing what we thought best in our own interest. But Commercial Treaties should be confined to those cases, such as France, where, having Wine Duties, it might be possible to obtain some practical results in the way of better commercial relations by reducing them. Anything further would be contrary to the principles of Free Trade, and would injure us. Some objection had been made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the beginning of the evening, in regard to a Supplemental Budget being introduced. But these objections could not be fairly applied to a case like this. Since the Budget of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had been brought in we had had a General Election and a change of Ministry. The objections to a Supplemental Budget were only applicable where there was a continuity of Ministry. It was a great slur upon a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Government that, after bringing in a Budget, they had to take it back and present it afterwards, in an altered shape, to the House of Commons. But the case was totally different in the present instance. The Budget was brought in at an unusually early time in the year. A new Parliament had been elected, which had changed the position of Parties, and this change had been effected in the belief that the Party now in power would give the country a better financial administration than the former Government. The country would, therefore, have been greatly disappointed if, when the new Parliament had met, and a Session of sufficient duration for the purpose was before it, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown any scruples about altering the financial propositions of the year, and had not given the country the benefit of his great financial experience in framing a new Budget. If they required special circumstances to justify it, they had them in the new position of the French Treaty, which, undoubtedly, did require some discretion to be given to the Government in treating with France, and in the distressed condition of the agricultural interest, which made it important that if any boon was to be held out to that interest, it should not be delayed for another year, but should be given at once. As to the scale of licences to be charged, it was quite true that was a question of detail for Committee, to a certain extent; but he thought there was a question of principle which it would be well if the right hon. Gentleman made clear before they went into Committee—namely, whether the increased scale was proposed entirely in relation to Revenue, or with relation to social regulation, by encouraging places where food and other articles of refreshment were sold, as well as spirits, as against those places which dealt in ardent spirits exclusively. He did not see why the amount charged for licences should stop where it did. The highest charge for licences was but a trifle to a large gin palace or hotel, and he thought the sliding scale should be carried up higher to meet those cases. For his own part, it was better that there should be no exemptions, because it would be difficult to draw the line. The Government would have to consider what course they should adopt.

MR. MULHOLLAND thought, from the course of the debate, that whatever might be the abstract objections to a Commercial Treaty, both sides of the House recognized the practical benefits that had resulted from the French Treaty, and were equally determined to support the Government in its negotiations with France. The extension of trade in 1860, which had exceeded the expectations of everyone, justified the policy of Commercial Treaties, and the Treaty, being followed by others with the principal nations of Europe, had had a moral effect that was as conspicuous as its material results. It was a satisfaction to him, and to those who thought with him, that a proposal which had emanated from their side of the House had been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Oxford had revived a right of contract, which had engaged the attention of the Wine Committee last year; but he had omitted to mention that he (Mr. Mulholland) had succeeded in carrying an Amendment to his Report by nine votes to five—

This was in opposition to the proposal of the hon. Member, that wine should be taxed as a specific article, “Wine,” at a uniform duty. He need not remind the House of the large proportion of the Revenue which was derived from the taxes on alcoholic drinks; and, with respect to both malt liquor and spirits, the tax was in direct proportion to the strength. On that principle would wine be made an exception? There was no practical difficulty experienced in taxing spirits for each degree of alcoholic strength, and it was given in evidence before the Wine Committee, that there would be no difficulty in applying that same principle to wine. The French themselves acted on this principle. Their internal duty on wine in bottle was eight times higher than on wine in cask. Even on the lowest strength the proposal of the Prime Minister was only four times higher, and he might mention that the Customs Returns showed the value of wine exported from France in bottle to be more than that, while the value of wine in wood was only just exactly the proportion proposed by the Prime Minister. The ordinary cheap wines would not be affected by this duty, as they were never shipped in bottle, the extra cost of freight and carriage on wine in bottle being more than they could afford.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE remarked, that in this measure the Government had enunciated both a foreign policy and a home policy—a foreign policy in that they sought to obtain power to reduce the Wine Duties, if they could acquire corresponding advantages for the trade and commerce of the country; and a home policy in that they proposed to confer a boon upon the agricultural interests by substituting a Beer Duty for the Malt Tax. It had been admitted that the agriculturists would derive great benefit from the transfer of the duty on malt to beer. It was quite clear that any increase in the Revenue must ultimately be paid by the consumer; and he was not sure that the change might not increase the price of beer. Beer, if pure and unadulterated, was a great advantage to the people, and it would be a great misfortune if the price of the national beverage was increased. As to the increase of the duty on the licences, he was strongly opposed to such a proposal, as it was a great hardship on a large number of inn-keepers, licensed victuallers, dining-room and refreshment-housekeepers; and would act unfairly, not only in London, but in many large towns in the country. Touching the licences, they had nothing to do with the principle of the Bill, and they might just as well be left out of it. The increase in the licences would be considered most unequal, most unfair, and unjust, and he saw no reason why the inn-keepers should be called upon to pay extra money when their trade was diminishing.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was not wonderful that this discussion had very much assumed the character of a debate comprising many subjects which might be more conveniently considered in detail when the Bill was in Committee. If, unfortunately, he should omit to refer in his remarks to any question of that kind in which hon. Members felt an interest, he should be glad to be reminded of it. In the meantime he would proceed to review the principal topics which had been mentioned. As regarded the Motion immediately before the House, he was not surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) should have raised a question of this kind; but he was open to an answer from this point of view—that, whereas spirits had always been taxed as simply alcoholic drink according to the quantity of alcohol they contained, it was to a great extent deemed desirable not to encourage their consumption, but rather to bring it to what would be the minimum compatible with the collection of the Revenue. There was likewise a financial objection to his hon. Friend's proposal at the present time. His hon. Friend said—"Do not raise the money required to effect a change from the Malt Tax by taxing incomes, but raise it by taxing beer." Now, to get the necessary sum in that way within the present year, he must raise the tax on beer in order to provide for the next year's Service of the country to a very considerable extent, and there was not any reason to know at the present time whether the money would be required for the Service or not. It would be impossible for him now to ask the House to make an extensive change in the Beer Duty that would not only add to the price of the article, but would also enrich the Exchequer for the coming year, and all future years, to a very large extent, and without a knowledge on his part whether the money would be wanted or not. With regard to the Licence Duty, it would be quite open at a future stage of the Bill to consider whether there was anything exceptional in the mode of valuing licensing houses in Ireland which made it necessary to modify the proposals now submitted. It was not, however, a matter which he was called upon to attempt to develop on the second reading of the Bill, and at so late an hour. He could not agree with his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Laing), who said this was not a Budget for Revenue. There was no doubt that a question of that kind could not be touched without raising several points of considerable difficulty in detail; but, among the general principles on which that part of the scheme rested, there was

should try to get rid of it as quickly as possible, and to have as little of it as they could. The point, however, was to have taxation so adjusted as not to interfere disproportionately with capital and industry. The reason they desired to have officers always present was that they thought that this would be far more to the interest of the brewer and of the trade; the liability to the obligation of making frequent returns would take the place of arbitrary restrictions as to the mode of conducting the business. The restrictions of the Malt Tax had been interferences with the trader in the building of premises, the stages of the processes themselves, the time he was to occupy in his different processes. For this interference it was proposed to substitute the obligation of making returns, and it was necessary that the officers should visit the premises for the purpose of inspection. In conclusion, he did not hesitate to say that the passing of that measure would not sensibly affect the course of trade in respect of the times and processes of brewing.

MR. MAC IVER said, he desired to point out that there were, at all events, two great authorities who were opposed to the course proposed to be adopted. He referred to Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill. He was not going to blame the Government for endeavouring to negotiate Commercial Treaties with France and Spain; but he thought they had got hold of the wrong end of the stick. This was no time for a reduction of the duties upon French and Spanish wines, but rather the contrary. Their proposal, described in whatever glowing language they pleased, bore a very strong resemblance to that particular form of reciprocity described by Lord Beaconsfield as a phantom. He would read to the House the opinion of John Stuart Mill upon the subject. In Book V., chapter 4, of Mill's Principles of Political Economy, they would find these words—

“A country cannot be expected to renounce the power of taxing foreigners unless foreigners will, in return, practise towards itself the same forbearance. The only mode in which any country can save itself from being a loser to the Revenue duties imposed by other countries on its commodities is to impose corresponding Revenue duties upon them.”

He (Mr. Mac Iver) admitted that in the early days of Free Trade some advantage accrued to this country; but the foreigner had not then learned what he had since learned, that this was the only country in the world which was prepared unresistingly to acquiesce in one-sided arrangements that left all the good to others. That which was now so often called Free Trade, and which each political Party had done so much to give them, was not Free Trade in any true sense of the words. It was only a system of free importation. It was, in reality, a system of protection to the foreigner. We exempted him from that share of our taxation which he ought to pay, and which John Stuart Mill thought this country ought to levy; and by thus relinquishing our power of taxing foreigners, the deficiency fell upon our own manufacturing and agricultural industries at home. Was he not right in saying that this kind of thing—this boasted Free Trade of ours—was only an imposture? The manufactures of all the world came here duty free; but whenever we tried to send our manufactures in return, they were heavily taxed. Was that Free Trade? He (Mr. Mac Iver) did not think it was; or that, so far as France and Spain were concerned, we were much the better of our foreign importations. The things we got from France and Spain were chiefly the luxuries of the rich, and they were imported at the cost of the working men of this country, who, by reason of these importations, were denied the right to labour. In his opinion, we considered unduly the interests of the consumer; and it should be remembered that in this country the working population were the producers as well as consumers. Those who were consumers only were the comparatively rich members of the community; and hon. Members opposite, notwithstanding their protestations to the contrary, considered the interests of the rich alone. The world at large had made no practical advance towards Free Trade principles; and there could not be a franker acknowledgement of this than in the Treaties which the Government were now negotiating. The Cobden-Bright Treaty of 1860 was not Free Trade. It was only an arrangement by which this country undertook to abolish the whole of its duties upon French manufactures in consideration of France slightly reducing her duties on some of ours. What had been the result of their 20 years' experience of that Treaty? Instead of elevating France to the prin-

of re-casting the Wine Duties, the essence of which was that everything that could fairly be called wine, whether the lightest claret or the strongest port or sherry, should pay one equal duty. This plan contained a principle which was quite anomalous in our liquor legislation, which, at present, aimed at taxing liquors according to their alcoholic strength. The proposal, if acted upon, would, he believed, be a new source of commercial discord between this country and France, and would involve a heavy sacrifice of Revenue. The great objection to the Malt Tax seemed to be the inclusion of farmers' hands in reckoning the £20 which formed the standard of exemption. Well, this was a question quite open to consideration. But if a farmer employed a large number of labourers who did not reside in the farmhouse, it was not open to consideration that he should be granted exemption in respect of those labourers. He was quite prepared to consider the question of inclusion of the farmers' hands, because he admitted that there was much to be said on both sides of the question. The hon. and gallant Member for Suffolk (Colonel Barne) was under the impression that the duty as it stood was increased by 10 or 15 per cent. He (Mr. Gladstone) declined to subscribe to that statement; and he could not accept the figures of his hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. M. A. Bass), which showed a large increase in the duty. He admitted that some modification ought to be introduced into the figures he had originally mentioned; but he declined to admit anything like an increase of 15 per cent on the duty. There was another increase of Revenue which he could not venture to predict, but which he was sanguine enough to hope for, and that was an increase in the quantity of beer brewed, because he believed this liberation of the brewing trade as to the choice of its materials, although the trade did not recognize it as a benefit, would lead to great advantages in the conduct of the trade, to great economy in the conduct of the trade, and, consequently, to the cheapening of the article produced; and, if so, it was not at all improbable that this result might take effect, among other ways, in an increase in the quantity of beer brewed, and in the Revenue derived from that source, quite distinct from an augmentation on the assumption that only the same quantity would be consumed. He had already stated that the Government were engaged in a careful examination of what might be the extreme claim which in justice the brewing trade could make, and he must remind the House of this. It was not to be supposed that the case of the brewing trade, as to the attitude it assumed on this occasion, was or could be, taking it all round, fundamentally different from that of all other trades that had been subjected to the effect of legislative changes. In the course of the last 40 years, having been conversant in almost every case with the great legislative changes that had taken place, he had never known any one of them in which the persons engaged in the trade distinguished themselves beyond the rest of the community in appreciating the ulterior results of the change. On the contrary, in a very large number of cases, the trades now among the most flourishing predicted total ruin in consequence of those changes. With regard to brewing by labourers and small farmers, if this were done off their own premises, they certainly would not come within the provisions of the new Bill; because, if the Government were to sanction the brewing off the premises, they would obviously get into difficulties, which they were determined to avoid, in respect of co-operative brewing, and they would find themselves rendering great injustice to the brewing trade. The two hon. Members who had spoken with great ability as members of the great brewing trade, had spoken of the restrictions, as they called them, under this Bill as being very harassing and inquisitorial, and as being more harassing and inquisitorial than those enforced by the law as it stood. The hon. Member for Staffordshire had said it was not particularly pleasant to have Excise officers on the premises. This might be true, though he was very glad that the hon. Member was able to give a just as well as a kind testimony towards the considerate manner in which the very intelligent officers of the Department discharged their duties. But whether or not it was pleasant was a question by itself. He did not maintain that it was pleasant. His doctrine was that the whole system of taxation was a very unpleasant one. He looked upon all taxation with great dislike, and they

At that late hour, he considered that he had said enough; when the proper time arrived he hoped to move the rejection of the Government Wine Duty proposals, as they were clearly not the way to deal with France and Spain. That kind of treatment had been tried before and had failed, and there was already abundant evidence to show that it would fail again. He begged to apologize to Mr. Speaker for having occupied the time of the House so long; but he thought that apology ought properly to come from hon. Gentlemen on the other side, because it was their fault for having so often interrupted him, and refused to listen to what he had to say. They had, however, been obliged to hear him, whether they liked it or not; and it was entirely due to them that his remarks had been so prolonged. He begged to move that that debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

The Motion not being seconded, was not put.

MR. ANDERSON said, he begged to withdraw the Amendment to the Bill that appeared in his name on the Paper. He should put down the Amendment for the Committee on the Bill, and hoped then to press his proposed alteration of the Bill on the attention of the Committee.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he had a Motion on the subject which would naturally have followed that discussion; but, on the present occasion, he should postpone it, and bring it again before the House in Committee.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

MERCHANT SEAMEN (PAYMENT OF WAGES, &c.) BILL.

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain.)

[BILL 119.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to consider Clauses with reference to the conditions of service of seamen and the licensing of their lodging houses.—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley.) Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

VISCOUNT SANDON, in moving the following clause:—

(Modification of Penalty for neglecting to join.)

"For neglecting or refusing, without reasonable cause, to join his ship, or to proceed to sea in his ship, a seaman or apprentice to the sea service shall be liable on summary conviction, instead of being liable to the penalty imposed by section two hundred and forty-three of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' to a fine not exceeding an amount equal to four weeks' wages; and in the event of his failing to pay the fine, and in that event only, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding, in England and Ireland, the term limited by law on non-payment of a fine, and elsewhere, six weeks: provided that if the neglect or refusal tend immediately to endanger a ship or cargo or the life or limb of any person belonging to or on board a ship, the offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be punishable accordingly," said, that if the Government were not willing to accept that clause he should not press them to do so. He should, however, be sorry to allow the opportunity to pass of releasing seamen from some of the penalties to which they were liable if they neglected or refused to go to sea. He was aware of the intention to introduce a general Bill next year dealing with the question of discipline on board ship, and he was convinced that that was a most serious matter. Seamen, at present, if they refused to go into a ship or to go sea were liable to be imprisoned for 10 weeks. The proposed clause he had drawn up during the time he was President of the Board of Trade, after having conferred with a number of leading shipowners on the subject. They had all agreed with him that it would be desirable to introduce such a clause by which seamen would be placed in the same position as landmen as far as possible with regard to breach of contract. If he neglected to go to sea after that clause had been passed, he would only be liable in the first instance for breach of contract. On a subsequent occasion he would be liable to a fine; and if that fine were not paid, to a month's imprisonment. So that imprisonment would only take place in case of non-payment of the fine. He was aware that a great many changes were desirable in the rules of discipline on board ciples of Free Trade, it had only taught her that this country was a very bad hand at making a bargain. They had not hitherto brought about Free Trade by their Commercial Treaties—arrangements by which, in obedience to the doctrinaire teaching of the Cobden Club, we gave up nearly everything we possessed, getting next to nothing in return—and they were not likely to do so by the present proposals of the Government. But they had encouraged France in the belief that she had only got to press us a little further and we would give up the Wine Duties too, and patiently submit to the Sugar Bounty system, as well as to the surtaxe d'entrepôt, and to any other injustice which she liked to perpetrate upon British commerce and British shipping. The proposals of the Government in regard to Spanish wines were of a similar character, and nothing less than an invitation to the Spaniards to drive a hard bargain with us. He well remembered the hopes excited by the Cobden-Bright Treaty of 1860. His experience as a carrier, which, with all respect to hon. Members opposite, was worth something, was that our trade with France had been, and was now, a trade principally of raw materials for French industries; but that what we brought from France was the finished products of valuable labour. He would ask whether such importations from France did not destroy our industries at home, and was not a very serious question for the British working man? Loaf sugar they now got, it was true, a farthing a pound cheaper than might otherwise be the case. But this was a wholly inappreciable benefit to the consumer, obtained at the expense of our own refiners, to the great disadvantage of our West Indian possessions, and to the injury of British shipowners. And yet that was what some people call Free Trade! He preferred very much the doctrines of Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill. So long as France taxed our manufactures, we ought certainly to tax hers. The Wine Duties were about all we now had to bargain with, and in themselves they were clearly insufficient to purchase those concessions which we had a right to get; but he (Mr. Mac Iver) saw no reason why some of our former duties should not be replaced. We could then bring some pressure to bear. The House would remember that he had several times asked the Government in regard to their prospective arrangements with France. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke), with the politeness which always distinguished him, had replied to his questions, but in a manner which conveyed no information. He (Mr. Mac Iver) wanted to know if the Government meant to insist upon those concessions which we had a right to get, and would take measures to obtain them? He wanted to know, specifically, if the Sugar Bounty system was going to be given up? Did France mean to reduce her duties upon British manufactures? Was she going to abolish the surtaxe d'entrepôt, and let foreign produce bought and sold in the Liverpool Exchange enter France upon terms as favourable as if imported direct? He had also asked the Government in regard to their negotiations with Spain; and, again, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke), with the most perfect courtesy, gave a reply which answered nothing. It was quite a mistake to suppose that our unsatisfactory commercial relations with Spain were a mere Wine Duty dispute. Long before this Wine Duty business Spain had harassed British trade; and, unless she was now going to do something to put matters on a better footing, we ought rather to think of doubling the Wine Duties than of reducing them. Spain was only trying to squeeze us because we had been found willing victims; and if we conceded the Wine Duties, we were only inviting her to press for something more. He would best describe the general condition of our trade with Spain by quoting from a letter which he had just received on the subject. Its words were—

“The Spanish tariff is a very big affair, the rates being different for nearly every article mentioned therein. Your hat, for instance, being one thing, your coat another, your boots another, and shirt another. This I found was really the fact, for on calling at the Consuls, they handed me a book, which, being in Spanish, I did not understand; but they explained that on glass, for instance, the duty is reckoned at so many pesatos (10*d.*) per 100 kilos; and there are as many different rates as there are qualities of glass. The rate is equally the same whether the goods come in a Spanish or a British ship; but although there are no differential rates in this sense, it is nevertheless quite true that a tax is levied upon British-owned steamers trading with Spanish ports.”

there ought to be a mitigation of the present law, with regard to summary arrest, in cases where seamen failed to fulfil their contracts. He was convinced that was a subject of the utmost importance, and the noble Lord had proposed to mitigate that law by substituting a fine in the first instance in lieu thereof. That was a step in the right direction, and he could not understand why the Government refused to agree to the proposal. Representing as he did, a large seaport, he ventured to assert that a large number of seamen understood the position they were in quite as well as anyone in that House. The proposal of the noble Lord was likely to prove a beneficial one, and he should support it. Notwithstanding the ejaculations of hon. Members below the Gangway, he should support the adjournment of the debate in order that they might have time for proper consideration of the clause.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gorst) would withdraw his Motion, and that the Committee might be permitted to get through the present stage of the Bill. He did not think that the reasons the hon. and learned Member gave were convincing to the Committee. He told them that seamen, of whom he made himself, in reference to that Bill, the champion, could get nothing more than promises in regard to that matter. He (Mr. Chamberlain) was sorry to find that he had so bad an opinion of the way in which his clients were treated by the present Government's Predecessors. [Mr. Gorst said, he stated they had been fed upon promises.] He understood the hon. and learned Member to say that, considering the number of promises, it was surprising that nothing had been done; he would not dispute with him, but merely undertake to say that the present Government should do something more than that. Next Session that subject would be thoroughly considered, and the Bill would then be much more comprehensive than the present one. It had already been stated that on the Report of the Bill a proposal would be made, by which the question now under discussion would be attempted to be settled; and he must say that if that proposal met with the amount of support from the hon. and learned Gentleman that he usually gave to all proposals for the advantage of seamen, then it would be impossible, in the present broken Session, to proceed any further with the Bill. He must say he thought it curious that delays of that sort invariably came from those who pretended to be in favour of the class the Bill would affect. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gorst) said, it was desirable that time should be given in order that the proposed new clause might be left upon the Paper, and left there a sufficient time to get into the hands of Members and be fully considered before they asked the House to take the next step. For his own part, he considered that was just the way in which seamen would be fed upon promises and get nothing beyond. His hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Hull (Mr. Norwood) had said that he should give his hearty support to the proposal of the noble Lord. He begged to say that, in his humble judgment, that proposal did not meet the difficulty at all, and it was on that ground that he was unable to accept it. What was, in fact, the complaint of the seamen? Why, undoubtedly, the anomalous position they were placed in with regard to their contracts. In case of breach of contract a landsman was liable to an action only, and not to criminal proceedings; whereas a sailor was liable to those proceedings, and might be in gaol many weeks in consequence. The noble Lord, by his proposal, still left the seaman subject to those criminal proceedings, and added a fine which, in all ordinary circumstances, he believed, the seaman would be unable to pay. What was likely to happen if the course proposed to be taken was followed? It was well known that certain magistrates, who had acted in a manner which seemed harsh, had sent to gaol seamen who refused to go to sea in ships which they deemed unseaworthy, and some of which ships afterwards went to the bottom. The fact of the ships having been lost, showed, at any rate, that the men who were imprisoned had good prima facie grounds for the belief which led them to refuse to go to sea and resulted in their imprisonment. If the proposal of the noble Lord were adopted the fine upon seamen would be very heavy; and as seamen were, as a general rule, a very impecunious class of men, the result would in a majority of cases be imprisonment, for the reason that the ship; but, although the matter was a comprehensive one and ought to be dealt with, perhaps, comprehensively, he thought there could be no harm in doing justice to the seaman thus far at once, and so prevent him being imprisoned for a long period for simply refusing to go to sea. He knew the difficulties the Board of Trade had in that matter; but he thought they could acquiesce in the proposition he had made. He would not press it on the Government, however, provided he obtained a pledge from them to deal with the subject; but he begged them to consider whether it was not a reasonable compromise in the matter, having been adopted by some of the best shipowners as a solution of the question.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he fully agreed with the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon), that the question of the punishment of seamen for refusing to go to sea was a most serious one; but, at the same time, he ventured to doubt whether the proposed clause could be accepted, inasmuch as it hardly dealt with the question. The real grievance of the seaman was that he was liable to arrest without warrant, and it was in that respect particularly that he was in a totally different position from other working men. The proposed clause would not relieve him from that at all. All it would do was to modify the law with regard to the penalty to be inflicted for refusing to serve. It was not, he thought, impossible to deal comprehensively with that question so as really to relieve seamen from that exceptional condition. He thought that if the noble Lord would communicate with his hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) between that time and the Report on the Bill, they might be able to propose a clause that would, perhaps, deal effectively with that question. Even if the clause were adopted it would give but temporary relief, as the Government intended to bring in a Bill to deal with the whole question next Session.

MR. GORST said, he did not like the idea of the Bill passing through the Committee stage before they had had an opportunity of seeing and discussing the clause proposed. Both the Predecessors of the Government and the Government itself had promised to deal with this matter, and he would suggest that they should report Progress—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"—]—in order that the clause which the Government were considering might be put upon the Paper and considered in Committee. He observed that hon. Members opposite cried out "Oh, oh!" Their idea of legislation was, apparently, to drive the Bill through as fast as they could. The Board of Trade seemed disposed to hurry it through without consideration or reflection; and, for his part, he begged to say that those Members who really had the interests of seamen and shipowners at heart, were not willing to allow that rash kind of legislation to proceed. He would inform hon. Members below the Gangway, who were, perhaps, fresh to the labours of the House, that when a Government announced an intention to propose a new clause, it was not at all an unusual practice for the Committee to report Progress, in order that that clause might be placed upon the Paper and be properly considered before the Bill passed through Committee. He should move that the Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gorst.)

MR. NORWOOD said, he should support the Motion which had just been made. He was of opinion that many hon. Members were entirely unacquainted with Parliamentary usages and the forms of the House, and they should exhibit more tolerance in the discussion of measures. Not long ago he had heard loud cries raised when an hon. Member had endeavoured to address the House. When those hon. Gentlemen who raised those cries had a longer experience, they would find that it was convenient to listen to all sides of a question. He knew that to men uninitiated in the doctrines of the House that was not altogether palatable. He thought it would be well if hon. Gentlemen would exercise a little more discretion, and not be quite so hasty in preventing measures being discussed. He ventured to support the proposal of the noble Viscount the Member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon). He thought which might cause them to be mulcted in damages. The proposal which was now made was, in his view, one which should be made in Committee when it could be fully discussed, and should not be deferred until the stage of Report when no hon. Member could speak more than once as to the details of the proposal. The difficulty of considering a new clause in a Bill on the Report of Amendments was extreme, and the difficulty was largely increased when, as on the present occasion, the new clause was more important than any part of the original Bill. The House was in progress with the Bill; and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade could lose but little, if any, time by acceding to the manifest justice of the case and consenting to Progress being reported, in order that further time could be given for consideration of the measure.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, Her Majesty's Government could not accept the clause, because they did not think it would have the effect of ameliorating the condition of the seaman, and so settling the question which was before the Committee, and which, undoubtedly, called for settlement. The matter must be dealt with next year, and Her Majesty's Government were anxious to bring about a satisfactory settlement. If possible, a proposal would be made on the Report of the Bill, which would have the effect of putting an end at once to the difficulties that had been raised; and he hoped that the Government would have afforded to them such an opportunity as they desired, their wish being to produce a satisfactory settlement of the question.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, his clause did not touch the question of arrest with warrant. This was a matter of the utmost importance, and one requiring very grave consideration. Two Sessions ago it was considered by a Select Committee of this House for many weeks, and if any hon. Member read the evidence given he would see that it went against the change proposed. The result of the inquiry to which he referred was that the question remained quiet for some time, until it was re-opened by the hon. Member for Morpeth. As far as he had been able to form an opinion on the question in its present phase, he thought it was of too grave a nature to be dealt with on the Report, and should, therefore, support the Motion to report Progress. As representing a large shipping community, he could say, without fear of opposition or doubt, that his constituency would be much surprised if a question of this importance was to be dealt with at the present stage. As far as his Amendment was concerned, it did not deal or attempt to deal with the large question which had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, but simply proposed to subject offending seamen to a fine instead of imprisonment in case they committed a breach of contract.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was afraid the noble Lord did not quite understand the question as it was stated at the commencement of the debate. He was quite prepared to admit that the clause which had been proposed dealt with a very important and complicated question, and was one which might require very careful consideration and discussion; but the Government were quite prepared to pledge themselves that, if the clause was not pretty generally accepted as a settlement of the matter, they would abandon all hope of dealing with it in the present Session. He hoped, however, that the proposal would meet the approval of the Committee for the reason that, as far as he could judge, the House was almost unanimous in its favour.

MR. NORWOOD said, the question was one of very great importance, and ought to be discussed in a manner which it deserved. The proposal made by Her Majesty's Government affected the whole shipping interest of the country, as it dealt with the owners of ships as well as with the seamen, and he could not admit that a proposition of the kind could be adequately discussed on the Motion for the Report of the Bill. The matter was one which ought to be dealt with in Committee, where it could be fully discussed, and he therefore hoped it would not be pressed by Her Majesty's Government at the present juncture. The noble Viscount (Viscount Sandon) was anxious to ameliorate the law, as far as the seamen were concerned, by substituting a fine for imprisonment; and he could not help thinking that the proposal was one which not only ought to be very carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government, but ought to be men could not pay the fines. It was urged that the imprisonment would be for non-payment of the fines imposed, and not for breach of contract. But this was not exactly a statement of the case which could be generally accepted as an adequate mode of dealing with the grievances which the seamen alleged to exist; and when the question came to be dealt with in a more complete manner next Session, it would be necessary to repeal the clause which was proposed by the noble Lord if it now became law.

VISCOUNT SANDON protested against the suggestion that this was entirely a seaman's question; he thought it was extremely undesirable that the House should hastily pass a judgment upon questions affecting seamen, which, though they occupied a large amount of time in the last Parliament, had not been satisfactorily settled up to the present time. The able, good, and steady seaman, was, perhaps, more interested than any other person in seeing that the crew of a ship was well constituted before he went to sea in her, and, therefore, it was important for every shipowner to pick his crews with the utmost care. It was also of the utmost importance that the shipowners should be careful to get their crews on board in good time before the fixed time for the sailing of the ship, as otherwise there was a probability that a number of worthless substitutes would ship instead of the competent men who had been engaged, and the competent men left would naturally object to go to sea with incompetent and unworthy shipmates, whose presence would be disagreeable to themselves and perilous to the safety of the ships and to the interests of the owners. He must, therefore, demur to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that, in supporting the views of those who desired to change the existing law, he was acting only in the interests of the seamen, because the true interests of the seamen were only to be provided for by taking such steps as would secure the shipping of sailors possessing the highest character as well as the best technical ability. The whole question was one of the greatest difficulty and delicacy, and he hoped it would be handled with the utmost care by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in view not only of the interest of the seamen but of the shipowners. The more closely the right hon. Gentleman looked into the question, the more clearly would he see the importance of dealing with it in a cautious manner.

MR. BENTINCK hoped the Committee would not adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. He would not attempt to discuss the question of who was or was not the sailor's friend, his view being that the only matter for present consideration was as to whether the time was opportune for discussing the question before the Committee. In his view the time was not opportune, and he therefore hoped Progress would be reported, in order that further opportunity might be afforded to Members to consider the details of the question which had been raised before pronouncing an opinion upon it.

MR. GÖRST said, he had been astonished by the appeal of the President of the Board of Trade, because he could not understand the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government asked the House to postpone till the Report the consideration of a new clause, which was more important in principle than any other part of the measure. He could not too strongly deprecate the fashion which seemed to be growing with Her Majesty's Government, of first introducing a Bill and then making Amendments affecting its vital principle at the last moment. He now asked for delay, because he thought it important that the new clause should be printed, and in the hands of Members, before the House was asked to determine upon it.

MR. COURTNEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would accede to the appeal for delay which had been made to him. The question involved was one of grave importance, and was not likely to be solved by bandying sarcasms as to who were and were not the friends of the seaman. The question was as to how sailors who did not fulfil their contracts were to be dealt with; and he felt sure that no satisfactory solution of it would be arrived at which did not deal with seamen as ordinary workmen who entered into contracts with their employers, and, if they broke such contracts, rendered themselves liable to civil action, which might cause them to be mulcted in damages. The proposal which was now made was, in his view, one which should be made in Committee when it could be fully discussed, and should not be deferred until the stage of Report when no hon. Member could speak more than once as to the details of the proposal. The difficulty of considering a new clause in a Bill on the Report of Amendments was extreme, and the difficulty was largely increased when, as on the present occasion, the new clause was more important than any part of the original Bill. The House was in progress with the Bill; and the right hon. thoroughly discussed by the House. He further thought that such discussion was scarcely possible, unless the proposal was allowed to pass through the Committee stage, when hon. Members could, if they thought it necessary, speak more than once, and so thoroughly sift the details of the question.

MR. R. H. PAGET thought the Motion to report Progress was a thoroughly reasonable one. They were told that the question was one of the highest importance, and one requiring much and careful consideration; and every hon. Member who had experience of Parliamentary proceedings knew that such consideration could not be given to a proposition which was made for the first time on Report of a Bill. The clause which had been vaguely sketched out by the Government was, in fact, the key-note of the Bill, and thus the most important clause in the Bill was not even printed. As far as he knew, there was no precedent for discussing a clause, involving a new principle, on Report, and he thought the Government ought not to use its majority for the purpose of compelling the House to take so unprecedented a course. He hoped they would assent to the reasonable proposition that Progress should be reported, in order that the Government might bring up their proposed clause, and that it might be properly considered in Committee.

MR. STEVENSON said, that, as the representative of an important seaport, he earnestly supported the proposal that had been made to report Progress, because he thought the new clause was one that ought to be discussed in Committee, and not on the consideration of Amendments which had already been made.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the Committee were hardly aware of the state of the case. The Bill was one in which he had personally a very great interest, for he drew every clause which it contained, and the Bill was, in fact, his own measure with a different name. He had the greatest possible interest in the passing of the Bill, and was not likely, therefore, to take any step which could have the effect of impeding its progress. He hoped it would be possible for him to support the clause which had been introduced by the Government; but he could not say what his course would be until he had had further time and opportunity for considering it.

Mr. Norwood

He protested against the course which had been taken in introducing the clause on the Report, for he saw no earthly reason why it should not have been introduced a month ago. It was of the greatest importance that the general understanding which had been long in existence should be adhered to, and that new principles should not be introduced into a Bill on Report which could have been introduced when the Bill was in Committee and there was ample opportunity for its discussion.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that when the Bill was last before the House he gave full credit to the noble Lord who had just spoken for its authorship, and hoped that, with certain modifications, it would be accepted by Parliament; but the noble Lord now asked why the alternative clause was not introduced earlier? All he could say was that, having only recently acceded to Office, and finding so many loose threads of legislation to take up, he had found it impossible, until within the last few days, to come to any satisfactory conclusion as to the best mode of dealing with this question. While he held that the clause which he had proposed would materially improve the Bill, he thought that, as there seemed to be a general desire for further time to consider the matter, he should not oppose the proposal to report Progress. But, under the circumstances, he must withdraw the pledge which he had been willing to give if hon. Members opposite had allowed the Committee stage to be taken and not to press the new clause on Report, if there were any serious objection. The new clause would now be discussed fully in Committee, and the Government would urge its adoption in the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Parnell, Mr. O'Kelly.)

[BILL 244.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PARNELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he hoped the House would allow him to take that stage of it on the present occasion. He should not have moved the second reading at so late an hour, but for the pressing emergency of the case, and because if he now neglected the opportunity of not obtaining the opinion of the House concerning the measure such an opportunity would not again arise owing to the difficulty which private Members found in obtaining consideration for their Bills. The provisions of his Bill were of a very simple character. In the first place, he proposed to appoint a Commission which should be charged with the relief of distress in Ireland, the Commission to consist of the Chairman and two honorary Secretaries of the principal organization which had been engaged in distributing the sums subscribed in relief of distress in Ireland during the past half year. The Commission would have the usual power of appointing a Chairman; and he proposed that there should be set aside for the purposes of relief of distress in Ireland £200,000 of the Surplus Funds of the Irish Church, which should be used as the Commissioners might think fit in relief of distress in Ireland. It was, of course, dangerous—to use the saying of President Lincoln—to swap horses when crossing a stream; but this seemed to be the process which was being pursued by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in reference to this question of relieving distress in Ireland. For six months the Relief Committees had afforded assistance to the distressed districts with but little assistance from the Poor Law Boards or the relief works. The subscriptions which these bodies had collected and distributed had now, however, almost come to an end; and they were face to face with the position that during the next month or six weeks some 500,000 people, who had been fed through the agency of the Committees to which he had referred, would have no one to look to for their daily bread. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said he relied upon out-door relief as a means of meeting the difficulty; but this system of relief was dependent upon the Boards of Guardians, which in Ireland had never been employed for this purpose. He was of opinion that he spoke the sentiments of those best able to judge when he said that he viewed with the utmost apprehension the result of trying such an experiment as was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, who had informed the House that in consequence of certain Boards of Guardians having failed to do their work he had decided upon dissolving them and appointing officials to do their work. This was all very well; but he doubted whether such officials would be able to cope with the existing distress. The Chief Secretary had, of course, the utmost desire to do all that was possible; but it was to be feared that the right hon. Gentleman did not know to the full the nature of the difficulties which were before him, and the magnitude of the crisis which was impending. It would be difficult to retrace any steps that might be taken after the mischief had happened and the people had died in large numbers of the famine fever which had broken out in many districts of the country. In these circumstances, he hoped that the House would accept the proposal which was embodied in his Bill, and would enable the Relief Committees which had, up to the present time, done so much good, to continue their work with the assistance of a grant of public money until the present crisis had been passed, and happily, with the blessing of a good harvest, the existing distress had been tided over. The system of out-door relief in Ireland was not managed in the same way as it was in England. It was in Ireland looked on by every Poor Law Guardian with the utmost repugnance and aversion as a plan opposed to all their most cherished convictions, and one which, in the present instance, would necessitate the borrowing of money that would have to be repaid by ratepayers, farmers, and others, who were reduced to great straits by the same circumstances which caused the poorer classes to be very poor indeed. He was afraid that the Chief Secretary would recognize the dislike to the system of out-door relief too late either to save his reputation as a Minister, or to save the lives of many of the Irish people. He believed that his proposal would prevent much suffering and save many lives within the next six or seven weeks; and he therefore asked the House to read it a second time, promising that when the Committee stage was reached he would carefully consider any proposal that might be made for its amendment. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MAJOR O'BEIRNE protested against any proposal which would put the Irish Land League—a Communistic association—in the possession of public money.

MR. PARNELL said, he had no desire to do anything other than to relieve Irish distress; and if it was objected that the Land League should not be intrusted with part of the work of distribution, he should be perfectly willing to omit it from the Bill.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, the Land League had been largely engaged in promoting electoral contests in various parts of Ireland, and the speeches made by its Members, especially in Leitrim—

MR. FINIGAN rose to Order. As one of the Members of the Land League, he denied the truth of the statement made by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), that the Land League was a Communistic association.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member who has risen to Order is himself out of Order in his interruption to the observation of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not enter into a discussion as to the Land League, for the reason that the present was not exactly the occasion on which he should be expected to give an opinion on the subject. He would only say that, in his view, the hon. Member for the City of Cork did wisely in offering to withdraw the League from the bodies mentioned in the Bill as those to be charged with the distribution of the sum to be granted. The question raised by the Bill was a very serious one; but he could not, on behalf of the Government, accept the Bill of the hon. Member for the City of Cork as a solution of the difficulty. Personally the Bill, if passed, would be a very great relief, for it would take off his shoulders a great deal of responsibility, and it would also tend considerably to lighten the responsibility of the Local Government Board; but he did not think this ought to be done. The Poor Law Board was now at work dealing with this matter; and he saw no reason for interfering with their work, especially as the granting of public money in the way suggested by the hon.

Member for Cork was altogether without precedent. There could be no doubt that in some districts the distress was very great; but in the West of Ireland it had been generally checked, and the Poor Law had been found sufficient for the purpose. It was true that a necessity had arisen for dissolving certain Boards of Guardians; but the Executive Government had put in their places other Guardians who, as he had reason to believe, were doing their duty and distributing considerable sums in the payment of out-door relief. As far as the fever was concerned, it arose during the continuance of the work of the Relief Committees, and could not, therefore, be said to have resulted from a discontinuance of the charitable relief. Furthermore, he had been unable to discover that the fever was famine fever. The last accounts he had received were more favourable; and he did not think the fever would be found to be more serious than any epidemic which might have occurred at any time and in any circumstances. He could not, therefore, admit the necessity for passing this unprecedented piece of legislation. He thought the House must rely upon the Poor Law Board to do the work, and upon the Irish Executive Government to keep that body up to its work, which, as a general rule, they were doing very satisfactorily at the present moment. There were certainly one or two Unions in a disorganized condition; but this was mainly due to the fact that they were heavily in debt before the difficulty came upon the country, and it had been found necessary to make loans to them. He did not oppose the Bill because he had no desire to see the distress put an end to, but because he thought it was the duty of the Local Government Board and the Board of Guardians to do what was necessary, in the way of out-door relief, to meet the difficulty.

MR. MELDON said, the main ground of objection which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had urged against the Bill was that he did not see why the local authorities in Ireland should be relieved of their responsibility to provide relief for the distress which was known to exist; but he (Mr. Meldon) had been unable to find anything in the Bill which would have that effect. All that the Bill would do would be to enable the Committees, which had done their work so well up to the present time, to continue that work for some six or seven weeks longer. It was true that in 1847 Parliament did not make any grant for the relief of the distress; but the circumstances were different, and he hoped that, on the present occasion, the small sum which was asked for by the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork would be granted, and that thereby many lives would be saved in different parts of Ireland.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, there could be no doubt that the proposal contained in this Bill was very singular, and one likely to strike the minds of English Gentlemen as not proper to be encouraged by the Legislature; but in his view the measure was justified by the extreme urgency of the case. The Parliament had not relied upon the ordinary processes of law to maintain the peace in Ireland; and he asked it now, in a moment of dire necessity, to depart from the ordinary modes of affording relief in order to preserve the lives of a large number of the Irish people. In former periods of distress in Ireland, whatever was done by the Government of the day came too late by several months, and all their efforts were outstripped by voluntary organizations, prominent among which were those of the Society of Friends, which did more to save life in Ireland than was done by the Government. The hon. Member for Cork now asked the Government to do temporarily, and on a small scale, what they ought to have done on former occasions, for no one could contend that by the administration of out-door relief in Ireland was the present emergency to be met. In some of the Unions the tenants, and even the Guardians of the poor themselves, owing to failure of their crops, were in positions of difficulty, and had, therefore, a great repugnance to taxation. He protested strongly against the exhibition which had been made on the opposite side by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), who had objected to any part of the sum mentioned in the Bill being distributed by the Land League, simply because he had been compelled to spend a few beggarly pounds in obtaining, or retaining, his seat.

MR. BIGGAR said, Her Majesty's Government were perfectly willing to plunder the Irish Church Fund in the interest of the landlords in that country; but they would not give a single shilling of it to save the poor from starvation and death. He appealed to the Government to change their resolution in reference to this matter, and give a second reading to the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). He also wished to tell the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) that the Land League spent no money at all in the contest which he had for his seat.

MR. MACARTNEY supported the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, on the ground of the exceptional state of things which existed in Ireland at the present moment. There was a great disinclination on the part of the Poor Law Guardians to do what they ought from fear of increasing the rates, which would have to be paid by people who were themselves in a condition of comparative distress. When the Irish Church was disestablished, the present Prime Minister said the best use that could be made of the funds would be to apply them to the relief of unavoidable distress in Ireland. An opportunity of so applying some part of the money was afforded by the present Bill; and he begged the Government to see that lives should not be sacrificed even though some part of the money asked to be given might be wasted by getting into the hands of unworthy persons.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he hoped the Government would not disregard the wishes of the Irish people in reference to this matter as they seemed disposed to do. The highest possible encomiums had been passed upon the action of the Committees which, in Dublin, had administered the funds provided for the relief of the distressed people; but when it was asked that the Government would enable those Committees to continue their work for an exceptionally short time objections were raised at once. The Irish people were, by this Bill, simply asking for some of their own money, in order that the supplies of food might not be suddenly stopped in districts where the most grievous necessity existed; and even if the demand was not founded on the strict doctrines of political economy it had a perfect justification in the exceptional circumstances which had arisen.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was very sorry that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had not been able to see his way to assenting to the second reading of this Bill, for he could not but regard it as unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman had opposed every proposal for the relief of Irish distress which had come from the Party to which he (Mr. O'Connor Power) belonged. As, however, he understood that the Motion for the adjournment of the debate had the assent of the Government, he was willing to take the fact as an indication that the Government were not unwilling to re-consider the announcement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman. If this was so, he hoped a decision would be reached as speedily as possible, for time was short and precious in reference to a matter of this urgency. He hoped that the Irish Executive would be able to see their way to consulting the Irish Members, irrespective of Party, on broad questions affecting the interests of the country, as was in former times done in the case of the Scotch Representatives, in order, if possible, that a harmonious course of action should be taken in preference to a hard and fast line which might have been suggested and almost decided upon. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, before attempting to deal in the short time which still remained of the present Session, would think fit to summon an informal meeting of the Irish Members of the House in order to ascertain their views as to the measures most likely to meet the wants and necessities of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was clear that nothing could be easier than to take money from the Surplus Fund of the Irish Church for the purpose of relieving distress, as was proposed by the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork City. But he could not help thinking that it would be dangerous to relieve the local authorities in Ireland from responsibility in reference to the maintenance of the poor, and so to release property in that country from bearing its due proportion of the burdens which should be borne by it. If he did not think the Poor Law Board could contend successfully with the difficulty, he should be inclined to accept the present Bill; but as he believed, after careful consideration of all the facts, that the Board was quite equal to the task, he could not, as at present advised, accept the proposals of the Bill, which would, he thought, set a dangerous precedent.

MR. BYRNE said, he should be inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the question of Poor Law relief, if such relief was administered, as in England, as out-door relief, to all who were destitute, and without reference to the cause of such destitution, and whether it was or was not in a Scheduled Union, and that it would not be necessary for families to go into the workhouse and be separated from each other. He did not think the system proposed would be the wisest or best for meeting the present emergency; and, therefore, he hoped the Government would assent to the second reading of the Bill.

COLONEL COLTHURST thought the best means of relieving distress in Ireland was by a proper and wise administration of the Poor Law; and, further, that an adoption in its entirety of the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork would involve an abnegation of the responsibilities and duties of property owners to contribute towards the maintenance of the poor. He had no particular objection to the making of a grant in relief of distress; but he hoped it would be so arranged that the distribution should take place through the medium of the Boards of Guardians.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he thought it a fair and reasonable proposition that a portion of the Surplus Funds of the Irish Church could be applied to the relief of distress, and that its distribution should be intrusted to the persons, who, as members of the Committees already in existence, had done so well the work which they undertook. While he objected strongly, as a general principle, to the maintenance of people by means of alms, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that the present was a case of the utmost urgency; and, therefore he supported the second reading of the Bill under discussion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that if the debate was adjourned he would bring the whole subject under the consideration of his Colleagues at the next Cabinet Council; but he wished it to be clearly understood that in his own particular case he was opposed to the principle of the Bill, on the ground that it would set a bad precedent in Poor Law administration.

DR. LYONS could not admit that the passing of the Bill would relieve the ratepayers to any appreciable extent of their responsibilities; because, though the sum asked for was a large one, it would not afford more than a very small sum per head of the distressed population in the way of relief, should it happen, as some feared, that Ireland would shortly have to face a further period of continuous distress. If he had any fault to find with the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork, it was on the ground of its inadequacy, and not that it was too extravagant in its scope. In his view, no sum less than £500,000 would be sufficient to meet the case. Should there be another bad harvest the Irish people would be visited by famine and fever. He was extremely glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had consented to consult with his Colleagues, and while that consultation was in progress, he hoped both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Cork would consider carefully the financial aspect of this proposal, and make up their mind as to whether they had asked the House for a sufficiently large grant to meet the emergency should it arise.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he liked the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork chiefly because it had held out a prospect of immediate relief and was approved generally by the Irish Members, who knew the wants and wishes of their countrymen, and who knew that the Board of Guardians would not and could not do all that was necessary to cope with the distress by the distribution of out-door relief.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE hoped the question would be adjourned in order that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland might bring it before the Cabinet and seek a decisive opinion upon it.

MR. PARNELL agreed to the adjournment of the debate, and said he would put the Bill on the Paper for the following Monday on the understanding that no unfair advantage should be taken of the adjournment to block the further progress of the measure.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL—(No. 85.)

(The Lord Houghton.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HOUGHTON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that as the subject had been so frequently discussed on former occasions it would not be necessary for him to deliver a long speech. In the various discussions which had taken place on the question with which the Bill dealt, matters of antiquarian, historical, and ecclesiastical interest had been thoroughly considered; and he should not, therefore, again travel over the ground which they covered, nor need he refer to the legal difficulties which had arisen from the differences between the law in this country and the law in those of our Colonies, where marriages of this description were legal. But he proposed to say a few words upon the ecclesiastical and upon the social aspects of the question. He gave the first rank to the ecclesiastical question, because it constituted the real difficulty which had to be encountered in dealing with the subject. While no one would more regret than he the absence of the right rev. Bench from the deliberations of that House, there could be no doubt that the measure would almost instantaneously become law but for the resistance of the right rev. Prelates. It should, however, be remembered that if the right rev. Prelates prevented the measure passing, with them also lay the responsibility. Already the people of England were beginning to understand that it was the Church of England, as represented in their Lordships' House, which came between them and what many of them thought a portion of their public rights, and thus interfered, so far as this question was concerned, with their domestic happiness. He had never disputed, either in their Lordships' presence or in the Lower House, that there was a general consensus in the Christian Church from very early times in regard to the prohibition of marriages of this kind. There was no doubt that the Christian Church soon began to bring within its domain the law of marriage, and several new provisions on the subject were added at an early period to the Canon Law. Among those provisions were some which dealt with marriage in certain degrees of kindred and affinity. What was the animus of the Christian Church in this matter was not easy to decide. It might be that it felt itself bound in some degree to go upon the lines of the Levitical Law. It might be that in those rude ages it was thought that every possible restraint should be placed upon the indulgence of the sexual passion. It might have been also that the Church was anxious to extend its own powers by imposing restrictions in regard to marriage. The Church might also desire to increase the sanctity attaching to marriage by every means in its power, although it always preached the superior piety of the celibate state. Whatever the motive, these rights of restriction asserted at a very early period by the Church were confirmed by the State. But with the right of restriction there was always associated the right of dispensation. But with the changes of time the right was asserted, but the practice of dispensation had disappeared. When, in the order of events, the question of marriage fell out of the hands of the Church and came into the sphere of the State, there came with it the necessity of a change in the law; and the consequence of the development of these views was that they had adopted civil marriage as the absolute law of the country. No religious ceremony was required—no connection with the Church of England or any other religious body. What was the consequence? Could the right rev. Bench any longer assert their authority over the question? An enormous body of their Nonconformist fellow-countrymen asserted that there was no religion in the question at all, and that the Bishops of the Church had no right to enforce their opinions upon others by allying their opinions with their office. Had the right rev. Prelates any right to impose their views upon that important section of the community? He remembered being struck many years ago by the remarks made to him by a distinguished Prelate, Bishop Phillpotts of Exeter. That eminent man said to him that he was only concerned in the question so far as it concerned the Church of England; if the House of Lords gave the right to contract such marriages to the Dissenters, he had not a word to say against it; there was no reason, he said, why he or his Episcopal Brethren should dictate to other communions than their own. What Bishop Phillpotts had expressed his concurrence in was all that he asked from the Episcopal Bench. Let the Bishops continue their ecclesiastical legislation as they chose; but they ought not to attempt to impose it upon the enormous body of Nonconformists; and he called upon them to show by what right they could interfere with what many thought to be their social and religious liberties. So much for the ecclesiastical aspect. He would next call attention to the social view of the question. This was not a matter which affected only one single class of the community; and he believed that its social aspect affected their Lordships more than the former. If the question concerned only the class of society in which their Lordships lived they would have a full right to follow their inclinations in the matter; but they were a Representative Assembly, and as such they must legislate not for a section alone, but for the community generally. His first inclination to take an interest in the question originated in what he had seen in his own neighbourhood in the North of England. There, in the great towns, he found those marriages were most frequent, and were made utterly regardless of the law. These marriages had been contracted in enormous numbers—and not only in the large towns, but in the rural districts—and would continue to be formed, because the grounds on which the interposition was based were purely ecclesiastical. What right had a certain number of people to oppose themselves to the comfort and honour of thousands? There was little knowledge of human nature in those who thought that the system of family relationship would be damaged by such a measure as this. The responsibility of marriage was the one thing which checked the appetites of men. But looking still deeper into human nature, it would be seen that the real danger lay in our best feelings—feelings of devoted attachment, of sisterly love ripened into affection, and which now came on without check or warning, which the proposed change in the law would suggest and interpose. He believed their Lordships would not be justified by refusing this Bill to oppose the desire of a large portion of the British people.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Houghton.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, their Lordships were fully aware of the very active canvass which had been made on behalf of the Bill, and to the powerful influences which had been brought to bear in its favour. He trusted, however, that their Lordships would not be deterred from applying their minds carefully to the examination of a proposal which mainly affected that family life which was the foundation of society and the source of all their purest joys. The Bill he must, in the first place, point out contained that very retrospective clause to which so much objection was taken last year; and, considering the promises repeatedly made by the noble Baron (Lord Houghton), that if the Bill was re-introduced it should deal only with the future and not with the past, he failed to understand why that pledge, given only last year, was not redeemed, and why in the Bill on their Lordships' Table it was provided that all marriages whatever which had been contracted within those prohibited degrees in this Kingdom or without should be valid. Some of their Lordships might think that, even if it were right to permit such marriages in future, there were good reasons why that legislation which was to apply to the future ought not to apply to the past. Those who had deliberately and with their eyes open entered into marriages which the law forbade had no just claim to the indulgence now demanded for them. The only reason he had heard from the noble Baron was that these marriages were contracted in enormous numbers. He begged leave to doubt the accuracy of that statement; but, at the same time, it was a fact that inducements had been held out for many years, and representations had been unblushingly made, that although those marriages were invalid if contracted in England they would be valid if contracted abroad. No one pitied more than he did persons who had been misled by those who ought to have known better into entering into those unions. But, even assuming that they had been contracted, as alleged, in enormous numbers, that was no reason whatever for refraining from considering the circumstances in which they had been contracted. If their Lordships were to be told that infractions of the law were to be reasons for changing the law, he asked, where was that principle to stop? Were they prepared to abolish contracts because one of the parties declined to fulfil the conditions into which they had entered? Would they abolish the law against bigamy because some men and women were not faithful to their marriage vows? Or would they repeal the law of larceny because there was an increase of juvenile crimes? He protested against that doctrine as being subversive of all legislation and morality. Whatever might have been the case previous to the year 1835—whatever obscurities or
